Prime minister links Holocaust with current threats to Israel

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Learning the lessons of the Holocaust means not ignoring threats to Israel from Iran and the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority, Prime Minister Stephen Harper said at last week's Canadian Holocaust Memorial Day ceremony on Parliament Hill.

The prime minister urged Canadians to be vigilant, and to learn from the past never to turn a blind eye to signs of trouble.

"We will not ignore them from Hamas and we will not ignore them from Iran," Harper said, referring to threats to Israel by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and from the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority.

"Words are not enough. It is only in our vigilance and in our actions that we will honour those who died in places like Auschwitz and Dachau," he added.

"Our thoughts and prayers go out to the victims of perhaps the greatest crime of the 20th century. More than 60 years later, it is still difficult to believe a plan of such scale and such evil as the Holocaust was conceived and carried out – but it was."

Harper referred to a session in the House of Commons earlier in the day in which Holocaust Memorial Day was discussed.

"Today we did a special thing that we don't do often in this place – all of us set aside our differences to listen to [MP and former justice minister] Irwin Cotler talk about the Holocaust... Whatever differences we have, we must never be afraid to stand together and speak out against the Holocaust."

Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, described how Israelis live under a constant shadow "that will never go away."

He also asked people to try to imagine six million people as individuals, "each with a name, a life and a family.

"Imagine what a contribution those six million souls could have made to humanity had they not been gassed and incinerated... We call on you, Canada, the Canadian people, we call on the international community, we call on all humanity, not to let this happen again."

The News in Brief

CANADA

New Portus Charges

TORONTO — The Ontario Securities Commission has filed more charges against the co-founders of failed hedge fund Portus Alternative Asset Management. The OSC, which forced Portus into receivership last year amid a number of investigations, said it has charged Boaz Manor "for failing to act fairly, honestly and in good faith with clients; and failing to meet his duties as a fund manager." The OSC also said it has charged Michael Mendelson "with unregistered trading; issuing non-exempt securities without filing a prospectus or having obtained a receipt from the director; failing to act fairly, honestly and in good faith with clients; and failing to meet his duties as a fund manager." Manor left for Israel last year after Portus collapsed and both he and Mendelson face other charges related to more than $800 million in missing investor assets. They have denied wrongdoing and the charges have not been proven in court.

WORLD

Canadian Wins Quiz

ASHKELON — Toronto teen Yisrael Witty beat 60 youths from 36 nations – including, for the first time, Peru and Poland – to win the 43rd annual Diaspora Bible Quiz last week in Israel. The Grade 10 Yeshivat Or Chaim student – a grandson of the late Rabbi Yitchak Witty, longtime head of Toronto's Board of Jewish Education – was to face Israeli and Diaspora youths in the International Bible Quiz on Yom Ha'atzmaut. David Pellow, in Grade 11 at Or Chaim, also qualified for that event. Moshe Cohen, a Grade 11 student at Montreal's Hebrew Academy, represented Quebec in the Diaspora contest but failed to reach the second event.

Not Keen on Shul?

NEW YORK — U.S. Jews are less likely than U.S. Christians to attend weekly services, a new Gallup poll says. Some 15 per cent of Jews say they go each week, versus two-thirds of Mormons and evangelical Protestants. From 43 to 45 per cent of Lutherans, Catholics, Presbyterians and Methodists attend weekly. The poll of 11,000 people was conducted from 2002 to 2005.

May Is For Jews: Bush

WASHINGTON — U.S. President George W. Bush proclaimed May Jewish heritage month. "As a nation of immigrants, the United States is better and stronger because Jewish people from all over the world have chosen to become American citizens," Bush said in his April 21 proclamation.

Anti-Jewish Acts Down

TEL AVIV — Incidents of violent anti-Semitism dropped around the world in 2005, an Israeli study found. An annual report issued last week by Tel Aviv University's Stephen Roth Institute for the Study of Contemporary Anti-Semitism and Racism said serious attacks on Jews in western Europe and North America decreased last year compared to 2004. But the report said 2005 levels were still the second-highest in the last 15 years. It credited the dip to global efforts to fight anti-Semitism, and to key 2005 initiatives such as events to mark Auschwitz's liberation and a UN resolution for an annual Holocaust Remembrance Day. It also said Mideast calm helped stem attacks in Europe fuelled by anti-Zionism.

Nazi Convictions Up

LOS ANGELES — The number of ex-Nazis convicted of war crimes – 16 – between April 1, 2005, and March 31, 2006, represents a 320 per cent increase over the previous year, the Simon Wiesenthal Center said in a report last week. Despite the gains, the report rapped some countries, including Austria, for refusing to cooperate in prosecuting Nazi war criminals on their turf.

Czechs Mark Yom Hashoah

PRAGUE — As Yom Hashoah was marked this year in Prague in an open public space for the first time last week, education ministers from 50 European nations gathered in the Czech Republic to learn about Holocaust education.

The venue for the April 25 ceremony was chosen by the Terezin (Theresienstadt) Initiative Institute so that it spoke to the entire public, not just Jews. The names of 80,000 Holocaust victims from Czech lands – 89 per cent of Czechoslovakia's Jews at the time – were read and their photographs shown. Previous ceremonies were held privately at venues such as the Pinkas Synagogue or the grounds of Theresienstadt, a former concentration camp.

Also last week, education ministers from 50 countries gathered for a two-day Council of Europe seminar on the Holocaust. It was held at the Theresienstadt museum and memorial on the grounds of the former camp.

Attendees were told teachers should help students make links between Nazism and some modern skinhead groups. Also, in his keynote address, former Czech president Vaclav Havel equated Turkey's killing of Armenians in World War I to the slaughter of Jews by the Nazis. Havel was key in setting up Shoah education in his country in the 1990s.

Demonstrators scream for action on Darfur

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

About 1,000 mostly young people raised their voices in a "Scream for Darfur" at a rally at Queen's Park on Sunday.

Instead of observing a moment's silence for the victims of genocide, the crowd bellowed loudly for politicians to take heed and intervene to save the people in Darfur, a war-torn region of western Sudan.

It is estimated that in three years of conflict, 450,000 men, women and children have been killed and two million more made homeless in a genocide led by a government-supported militia called the janjaweed.

Norman Epstein, co-founder of Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan (CASTS), called on Prime Minister Stephen Harper to show leadership in marshalling outside nations to step in and help the people of Darfur.

The prime minister once said, "'I want a country that does not lead from the bleachers,'" Epstein said. "Today I see no bleachers. I see hundreds and hundreds of Canadians in the field screaming, 'Mr. Harper, lead.'"

The Queen's Park rally was one of dozens held across North America. In Washington, thousands gathered at the Mall to hear advocates call on President George Bush to save Darfur.

Alona was giggling ... suddenly everything went black

On a warm evening in Tel Aviv, 14-year-old Alona Shportova and her best friend, Kathryn Kastiniada, both energetic, happy teenagers, decided to go dancing.

They got to the Dolphinarium Disco and stood in line waiting to get in. Kathryn was beside Alona and the two were giggling and talking when suddenly everything went black. Alona remembers nothing of what happened during those moments.

A Palestinian terrorist blew himself up half a metre from them. Alona's best friend was killed instantly. Alona was severely wounded, losing the left side of her brain. Consequently, her right arm and right leg are paralyzed, and she has lost some of her speech and memory capabilities.

The doctors warned her family that her chances for survival were very slim. Alona is considered a medical miracle. Despite this, she cannot do anything on her own, and is still fragile. She can no longer read or write and often forgets from one minute to the next what she was going to do or say.

With four years of rehabilitation behind her and many more ahead, Alona Shportova remains determined to recover her life.

"I want to be like all the girls my age," Alona says.

After more than 30 surgeries, Alona is getting the help she needs at Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv. She uses the gym and the swimming pool for her ongoing therapy. The skilled staff and her new friends offer her much-needed support and encouragement. There she can see that rehabilitation is possible. Says Alona's mother: "Everyone at Beit Halochem cares deeply and gives her so much attention ... It is as if she is part of a family, a little sister."

In our own ways, we all protect Israel

From the editor's desk

For most of the Jewish people, at least for those of us born in the dark mist of the shadow of World War II, the celebration of Israel's independence is very much more than merely the celebration of a political anniversary.

It is the celebration of the proof of the power of hope and of the force of an ideal.

Yearning for the refounding of a sovereign, this-world, run-by-human-beings, physical, Jewish state in the biblical land of the Jews has been at the very core of Jewish theology, liturgy and ritual since our forebears lost that sovereignty some 2,000 years ago. The ideal of living once again, as a free, self-governing people was the hope that sustained us through the many lands and many years of our dispersion.

For thousands of years, our daily prayers and our festival prayers always included the prayer for Return. Our calendar, language, folkways, superstitions, certain of our foods, and for many, our faith, were oriented toward the hope and the promise of Return.

But one need not have been pious to have sensed and understood in 1948 that something different, something perhaps even outside the normal flow of time had happened when the State of Israel was proclaimed and when it emerged victorious from the blood-soaked war launched against it at its birth by its neighbours.

Thus, celebrating the refounding of a sovereign Jewish state, to a great degree, is also the affirmation of the deep values of our faith and the theological doctrines in which we have long believed. Somewhere in the vast, metaphysical beyond of human existence, we comfort ourselves, the forces for good have aligned for all remaining time in a splendid heavenly geometry.

And that explains why so many of us strive with all our might to "protect" the Jewish state. Our first wish, to be sure is to protect the men, women and children there, but we are also intent on protecting the ideals of hope and goodness, and one of the key millennial purposes of our faith.

Of course, different people "protect" Israel in different ways. Soldiers defend, students rally, editorialists write and doctors heal.

Two years and one month ago, I wrote about an emergency medical mission to Israel by Allan Covens, a gynecological oncologist at Toronto's Sunnybrook Hospital and at the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto.

Responding to the plea from a doctor in Israel who had trained with him in Toronto, Covens rushed to the hospital in Afula to operate on a patient in her early 20s.

Covens is one of the world's foremost experts in treating cancers of the cervix through laparoscopic surgery. Perhaps more than anyone else, he has advanced this method of treatment in an effort to preserve the fertility of women afflicted with this particularly insidious and cruel type of cancer.

Allan Covens

By all accounts, the surgery was a success, although the final assessment will only be known in about three years.

"I felt a sense of obligation to the patient even though I didn't know her, to my colleague and to the country," Covens told The CJN at the time.

Last month, The CJN met with Covens once again. A new medical tale could now be told.

Another of Coven's former trainees in Israel, Dan Grisaru, had called him earlier in the year urgently seeking his help with an unusual case. (Indeed, are there any other kind in which Covens is called upon to intercede?)

The patient was 14 years old, "a skinny, little girl," as she was described to him. This was an extremely young age for someone to have developed cervical cancer. But the cancer had already spread to at least one of her lymph nodes. The first priority in the situation was to cure the cancer rather than to preserve the patient's fertility.

Covens acceded to his former student's special plea for help and flew to Tel Aviv. "I had no hesitation to go," he told The CJN. There was little time to spare. "It was basically a last-minute thing.

"The surgery was very difficult due to the small, narrow area in which we had to operate. It took 10 hours."

The patient came through the surgery quite well. But because the cancer had appeared in her lymph node, she also needed radiation therapy. "She is doing okay," Covens said in his typically understated, cautious way. "We'll know for sure in a year or two."

The patient's mother was from France; her father from Russia. They spoke no English. But through the patient herself, the family and the physician from Canada managed to communicate their respective gratitudes and hopes for a full recovery.

Along with students from other parts of the world, Covens has already trained three Israelis in his specialist three-year program. One is currently in his program; two more Israelis are slated to train with him in the future. Within four years from now, Covens proudly pointed out, there will be a gynecological oncologist trained at Sunnybrook Hospital in every major population centre in Israel.

As we know, "protecting" Israel takes as many forms as there are human beings seeking to do so. But is there any way more profound than that which Allan Covens has chosen?

Former partisan bears witness at commemoration

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Sara Ginaite-Rubinson, author of three books on the Holocaust in Lithuania, told a crowd of close to 2,000 people last week that she has "fulfilled her holy obligation to bear witness and remember those who did not survive" and that despite her age – over 80 – she hopes to be able to continue to do so.

The retired York University professor was the keynote speaker at this year's Yom Hashoah community commemoration held at Earl Bales Park. The Apr. 24 event was co-sponsored by 13 Jewish organizations and facilitated by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

(This year, for the first time, the Toronto Board of Rabbis was not among the sponsors or participants of the event. TBR members, consisting mainly of non-Orthodox rabbis, contend that by adhering to standards of Orthodox Judaism that preclude the participation of female clergy, female soloists and mixed choirs – the event no longer reflects the Jewish community.)

Ginaite-Rubinson, who was born in Kaunas (Kovno) in 1924, told of her decision to take her fate into her own hands after more than 9,000 of her fellow Jews were killed in her hometown in one day in 1942. Then 17 years old, she decided to join the underground resistance movement, where she met her husband, Misha Rubinson.

"If it was bashert for me to die, I would die on my own terms," she said.

The following year, her group of ghetto fighters were ordered to escape and join the partisans. She saw her mother one last time when five fighters were ordered to return to the ghetto from the Rudninkai Forest – walking more than 100 miles on foot on cold winter nights – to establish contact with the underground there.

Life in the forest was "dangerous and difficult," but it was a "life of freedom," she said. Her detachment would participate in the liberation of Vilnius in 1944.

Her family reunion sparked "intense joy and fear." Her mother, who would perish before the war's end, told Ginaite-Rubinson she had been overjoyed to know that she had escaped the "gates of hell."

Because of the decreasing numbers of Holocaust survivors, "we should do whatever we can in order to preserve these memories, in order to teach our children and to let the world know what happened," said Ya'acov Brosh, Israel's consul general in Toronto.

Now that the State of Israel exists, it will ensure that any hand raised against Jews today will be "cut" before a crime is committed, he added.

"We are committed to sending a strong message to all Ontarians that there is no place for anti-Semitism – not in this city, not in this country, nor any place in the world," said Colle.

Other participants in the ceremony included violinist Ruth Fazal, Cantor Tibor Kovari, Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, General Wingate Branch 256 Royal Canadian Legion and the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, Toronto Post. Two members of Hillel of Greater Toronto, Judy Siklos and Shira Zeliger, read names of Holocaust victims, and a group of students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Richmond Hill branch read dramatic commemorative excerpts.

Annie Gamliel and David Tock of Canadian Young Judaea also read poignant vignettes as six commemorative candles were lit to honour Jewish victims; Jewish children who were killed; survivors; children of survivors; Jewish partisans, resistance fighters and Allied armed forces; and the righteous among the nations.

Jewish heritage sites to be marked

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jews have lived in the city of Toronto for better than 150 years, making their mark in the political, cultural and social realms. Now, Heritage Toronto, a charitable agency of the City of Toronto responsible for heritage programming, has agreed to commemorate the Jewish contribution to Toronto by marking Jewish historical sites with commemorative plaques.

Although still in its early stages, the project could see 20 or more plaques placed on such locations as the site of the city's first synagogue (a number of stores at the foot of Bay Street), the original Mount Sinai Hospital (on Yorkville Avenue) and the first Yiddish playhouse (the Standard Theatre at Spadina Avenue and Dundas Street).

Other possibilities include commemorating the contribution to Toronto of significant historical figures, such as its first Jewish mayor, Nathan Phillips.

Eric Slavens, a member of the Heritage Toronto board, conceived of the project and set it in motion. He has called on his extensive contacts in the Jewish community to fund the project and suggest possible venues to be honoured.

Response has been impressive, said Slavens, the former chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region and current president of State of Israel Bonds Canada. More than $25,000 has been raised in a little more than two weeks and several ideas for commemorative sites have been suggested.

Slavens has also solicited the co-operation of Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA), an agency of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. OJA has agreed "to participate as a partner with Heritage Toronto to ensure the careful selection of appropriate plaque subjects and to consult in the drafting of appropriate texts for these plaques," according to a letter from OJA director Ellen Scheinberg.

Slavens, a history buff, said each plaque and marker project includes the expense of research, design, production, installation, a perpetual maintenance fund, publicity and a reception to launch the project. Cost of a marker is expected to range from a few hundred dollars to $4,000.

"Toronto is an amazing city for many reasons, not the least of which is its rich and varied past," Slavens stated. "It is important that we are all active in ensuring that our Jewish heritage is maintained, restored, communicated and celebrated through a professional comprehensive series of plaques and markers across Toronto."

If the pilot project proves successful, other communities may follow suit, he added.

No cause more precious

The small photo that appears in this editorial is an eloquent capsule of the history that Israel's enemies are now trying to distort and erase. It is also timeless, tearful testimony to the courage and sheer heroic will of the Jews of Israel to defend their rightful claim to build their homeland in the land of their ancestors.

Travellers climbing the road to Jerusalem from its western hills always pass the remnants of the armoured vehicles that lie amid the pine needles on the side of the road. The vehicles were part of the convoys that tried, alas often in vain, during the War of Independence, to break the siege of Jerusalem by the Arabs who were attempting to starve and deprive of water the more than 80,000 Jews who lived there.

Hundreds of soldiers and civilians lost their lives trying to break the siege of Jerusalem. Eventually, the blockade was broken. It was a melancholy portent of the days and years to come. For, over the years, thousands have died in defence of the sovereign Jewish state. As of this writing, 22,123 servicemen and women have fallen defending the Land of Israel since 1860, the year Jews began to settle outside Jerusalem's Old City walls.

Except for a brief period immediately after the expulsion by the Romans in the first century AD, Jews have always lived in Jerusalem. Indeed, except for brief periods over the years, Jews have also always lived in Hebron, Safed and Tiberius.

Despite their best efforts, no amount of prevarication and duplicity on the part of Israel's enemies can change that. The Jews are indigenous to the land of Israel. It is important that Israel's enemies know this truth: Jewish wandering has come to an end. Jewish Return is in full flower.

Israel's prime minister Ariel Sharon conveyed the message very well on the occasion of the 57th Yom Ha'atzmaut of Israel, May 11, 2005, his last as prime minister of Israel.

"The State of Israel is a modern and vibrant country built on deep and ancient foundations. It is a country risen from the ashes of the Holocaust, a country of refugees which has become a haven for Jews from all over the world. As the only free and open democracy in the Middle East, the State of Israel has developed, flourished and prospered... We are among the world leaders in the fields of technology, medicine, agriculture and the arts, as we continue to stride boldly into the 21st century.

"Despite the hardships we face, the people of Israel remain strong and resilient, and with the support and solidarity of our brothers and sisters in the Diaspora, we will be able to overcome all challenges on our path. We share a common history and heritage, and are entrusted with the mission of ensuring the future of the Jewish state." Chag samayach.

25 years ago in The CJN

Controversy surrounded Saudi Arabia's efforts to acquire more and better weapons, as West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt announced that Berlin was refusing to supply Riyadh with Leopard tanks, self-propelled armoured vehicles and other equipment. But despite protests from Jewish groups, the United States still planned to sell AWAC spy plans and other advanced weapons to the Saudis.

Yom Hashoah memorial program

The Yom Hashoah community commemoration at Earl Bales Park was an all-inclusive event in which men, women and teenagers participated with an audience that included members from across the Jewish community, so that a feeling of togetherness was truly manifested.

I find it sad that there are a few in our community who would use such a holy evening for the purpose of furthering a political agenda that ultimately divides and does not unite us.

As a Holocaust survivor of three camps and a death march, and a community activist in Holocaust education in Toronto, I wish to express my wholehearted support for the stand the Toronto Board of Rabbis took in connection with the community-wide Yom Hashoah memorial service in Earl Bales Park ("Why we chose not to take part," CJN, April 27).

I am in agreement with their reasoning and wish to add only that in addition to others who were in attendance, the Orthodox Jewish women, half of the Orthodox community, was also deprived by this decision of the organizers to hear the sweet voices of a mixed children's choir, who in many ways would have been mirroring and honouring the memory of the 1.2 million murdered children – girls and boys alike.

I find this kind of discrimination, 61 years after the Shoah, deeply disturbing and totally unacceptable.

I attended the community-wide Yom Hashoah memorial service in Earl Bales Park on April 24 together with my four children. The guest speaker was a woman, two young ladies were reading out names of Jews who perished in the Holocaust, the violinist was a woman and several of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto students participating were females, so I fail to see how Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich and the Toronto Board of Rabbis could not participate because the program "marginalized women or children in any way, shape or form" ("Why we chose not to take part," CJN, April 27). The "diverse and rich fabric of our Jewish community" was well reflected in the program, and I would hope that we as a Jewish community can take pride in that which unites us rather than take actions that further divide us.

As university students who are active in the Jewish community, we wish to express our disappointment in the divide that has occurred as a result of the organizers' decision to bar the girls of the Renanim Youth Choir from participating in community-wide Yom Hashoah commemoration in order to appease the Toronto Vaad Harabonim ("Group of rabbis withdraws from Yom Hashoah event," CJN, April 21). While recognizing the halachic stringency involved in the matter, the divide it has caused has sent a disheartening message to us, the current and future young leaders of the community.

By silencing the children in the choir, the organizers are excluding a large segment of the community who are inspired by the voices of children and who can relate to Holocaust commemoration through song.

Would it not be possible to allow those who are offended by the voices of a co-ed children's choir to leave during that part of the program? We hope that the current leadership of our community will be able to work more cohesively in the future.

Toronto's Yom Hashoah memorial program has historically served as a North American model for community co-operation in the interests of a higher cause. Toronto's program is the largest Holocaust commemoration outside of Israel, and our event on April 24 was both moving and successful.

In "Why we chose not to take part" (CJN, April 27), Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich is correct in asserting that "having the community draw together, and not apart, in these moments had great value and meaning." Nothing should deflect from the overriding purpose of the Holocaust memorial event and those whom we are memorializing.

As co-chairs of this year's Yom Hashoah commemoration, we are extremely distressed that another issue was allowed to take centre stage and we regret the Toronto Board of Rabbis decision to withdraw from the event.

Now that this year's event has passed, we will be conferring with all parties to determine whether a truly unified initiative is possible next year. We urge all involved in this exceptional event to remain focused on its primary purpose.

Speaking out on Israel's behalf

By JENNIFER LASZLO MIZRAHI

The 5th of Iyar on the Hebrew calendar, May 3 this year, marked the 58th anniversary of the creation of the State of Israel. Despite having to live under constant conditions of war since the very first days of its life – and in recent years, under threat of hideous terror as well – the young country has prospered and has made significant contributions in scientific, medical, cultural, economic and other areas for the betterment and advancement of humankind.

Sadly, however – primarily though not exclusively because of the predominance of the often problematic coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the western media to the virtual exclusion of the countless positive aspects of life in Israel – many Jews are unable or unwilling to speak up in support of Israel. Indeed, polls in the United States show that many of us won't talk about Israel to our friends, co-workers, or even to some family members.

One of the reasons for this is that we simply do not know how to make such a conversation comfortable or successful in terms of persuasively making a few essential points concerning Israel's case and its cause.

The following are 10 suggestions from among many possibilities to help us speak out successfully on Israel's behalf.

1. Let people know that Israel wants peace.

North Americans need to be reminded that Israel has a long-term commitment to peace. Israel accepted the need for a two-state solution as early as 1947, again at Camp David (2000) and in the process that led to the road map peace plan. When courageous Arab leaders such as Egypt's president Anwar Sadat and Jordan's King Hussein extended their hands to Israel, peace was achieved. Recently, Israel made painful sacrifices – moving some 9,000 citizens and giving up all of Gaza in the hope of having peace. Israelis are firmly committed to peace for both sides.

2. Don't pretend that Israel hasn't made mistakes or is without fault.

It's not true and no one believes it. Pretending Israel is free from error does not hold up. Doing so will only make your listeners question the veracity of everything else you say. No western government has been error-free in fighting terrorism. For example, while fighting in Iraq, America has not yet found Osama Bin Laden. No one could reasonably expect Israel to be totally successful in all its efforts to stop terrorism.

Admitting that Israel has made mistakes and will likely make more does not undermine the overall justice of Israel's goals and efforts to have peace and security and a better quality of life for both sides.

It's not a weakness to say, for example: "I know that in trying to defend its children and citizens from terrorists, Israel has accidentally hurt innocent people. But Israel must defend itself. If terrorists had crossed Canada's borders more than 250 times and killed innocent citizens in pizza parlors, coffee shops and buses, what would the Canadian government have done? What protective steps would Canadians demand of their government?"

3. Be empathetic toward the Palestinian people – especially the children.

Let the other person know that you long for a time when Palestinian children will be raised to be doctors, farmers, teachers and business people – not suicide bombers. Israelis want a better future for both Israel and the Palestinian people.

In the West, it is a matter of common decency as well as common sense to raise our children to love life and to want to do good things with their lives. Yet, to this day, unfortunately, many of the institutions within organized Palestinian life talk about and teach a culture of hate that glorifies violence and death and encourages even small children to become suicide bombers.

Thousands of Palestinian children attend some 300 public schools named after terrorists. Palestinian public television uses Sesame Street-type programs to glorify suicide bombers. No children should be abused in such a way. Palestinian children deserve better. They deserve the coddling and cooing of love, not the incitement and ingestion of hate.

4. Remind people of Israel's deeply democratic nature.

There is a strong connection between Canada and Israel based on shared values and interests.

Israel is a democracy in a part of the world that has no other democracies. In Israel, Christians, Muslims and Jews all have freedom of speech and religion and the right to vote. Nearly a million and a half Arabs are citizens of Israel, representing almost 20 per cent of the population. Furthermore, 11 Arabs and 21 women serve in Israel's 120-member Parliament, and an Arab judge is a member of the Israeli Supreme Court. On another level entirely, a recent Miss Israel was an Israeli Arab.

Israel is the only place in the Middle East where a young girl can grow up to be anything she wants to be – from a doctor to a mother to a businesswoman – and even prime minister!

5. Draw direct parallels between Israel and the West, including the need to defend against terrorism.

Israel is an important western ally in the war against terrorism and faces the same challenges as western countries do – indeed probably more – in protecting its citizens.

Israelis know what it's like to live with the daily threat of terrorism. They know what it's like to send their children off to school one day and bury them the next. For them, terrorism isn't something abstract that they read about in the newspaper. It's a ghoulish scourge they have had to contend with since well before September of 2000.

6. Acknowledge the contributions of good Arab leaders as well as the deceptions and prevarications of the bad leaders.

Sadat and King Hussein were people of courage who stood up to terrorists, told their people to put down their guns and made peace with Israel.

Hamas is a terrorist organization today, but we can still hope its leaders will change their ways and embrace a real and lasting peace with the Jewish state. A change in their words alone, however, will not be enough. Only when they recognize Israel's right to exist, end terror and the culture of hatred of the Jewish state, and honour previous agreements between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, will we be able to say that Hamas appears to have changed.

Young people hold Israeli flags in Tel Aviv Nov. 29, 1997, during celebrations marking the 50th anniversary of the 1947 UN Palestine Partition Plan, which led to the creation of the State of Israel. [Reuters/RNS photo]

7. There is never, ever, any justification for the deliberate slaughter of innocent women and children.

The primary Palestinian public relations goal is to demonstrate that the so-called "hopelessness of the oppressed Palestinians" is what causes them to kill Israeli children. This must be challenged immediately, aggressively and directly:

Say, "We may disagree about politics and we may disagree about economics. But there is one fundamental principle on which all peoples from all parts of the globe must agree: civilized people do not target innocent women and children for death."

8. Explain the basis of your support for Israel.

North Americans respond much better when they know the underlying facts. For example, why is there a security fence?

On more than 250 occasions, terrorists have travelled through that area on a mission to kill innocent people. Israel must defend its citizens from terrorism, and the fence is a critical part of this defence. At the outset, most Israelis, including then-prime minister Ariel Sharon himself, were opposed to the construction of a security fence. But the persistence of Palestinian terror forced them to reluctantly change their minds.

9. Use the plain truth.

It is entirely legitimate to ask: How can anyone call it a "cycle of violence"? If Israel stopped fighting terror and simply surrendered the right to defend itself, would the violence end? Of course not.

On the other hand, if the Palestinian leaders had agreed to a territorial compromise, would the Palestinians not have long ago had their state? Would the fighting and the conflict not long ago have ended?

If they had stopped their terrorism, if they had stopped trying to infiltrate bombs and other explosives in ambulances, under the clothes of pregnant women, inside baby carriages, in the underwear of people or in the packages carried by young children, just to name a few examples of attempted smuggling, would the curfews, checkpoints and even the security fence not have all come down?

Is it too much to ask that the Palestinian leadership condemn all terrorist activities, including suicide bombings? Is it unreasonable to insist that they stop killing innocent civilians before Israelis jeopardize their security with more territorial and other concessions for peace?

10. KISS and tell!

Successful communication is not about proving how smart you are, or about being able to recite every fact from the long history of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Do that, and you're almost guaranteed to lose your audience. Rather it is about imparting a core message and repeating it.

In Israel's case that core message is this: Israel is a democracy whose people desperately want a way to make peace, whose leaders have striven to make peace since even before the state came into being and who will continue to seek a way to make peace with its neighbours. But not at all costs. Not at the cost of its very existence as a sovereign Jewish state.

Israel's neighbours must want peace too. They must, in truth, acknowledge and accept that the Jewish state has a rightful place in the Middle East.

Praying or humming?

We were sitting one Friday evening in the current "in" place of worship in Jerusalem, known for its congregational singing. At one point in the service, a colleague whispered to me in Yiddish: "M'lozt nisht davenen" ("They don't let you pray here"). He had a point.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

The niggun, the wordless prayer that was once chassidic and has now become universal, dominates the "singing" in many Jewish worship services. The chant is pushing out the word. Most prayers are said quickly and often silently. It seems that you don't need to pray as long as you can hum.

You don't need to know Hebrew either. Though this is, of course, not the case in Jerusalem, outside Israel, this form of worship eases the pain for those who don't know Judaism's language of prayer. People have often said that, had they known Hebrew, they would have attended services more often. But congregations that use English in their services don't attract many worshippers, either. The niggun seems to be doing much better than both the original and the vernacular. It offers mood without content.

Yet, believing with Heinrich Heine, the German Jewish poet, that "Jews pray theology" – meaning that we don't emote when we pray, but make definite statements – I am uncomfortable with wordless prayer. Deprived of language, the prayer can mean anything. And if it can mean anything, is it necessarily Jewish?

On the other hand, since Heine's time the world has seen the abuse of language, so the effort to reach Heaven without words may be a wholesome development.

Nevertheless, I remain worried. When we abandon language, we also abandon content and thus sow the seeds of anarchy. What is perceived as warm and fuzzy only has the significance that individuals ascribe to it. That may mean that anything goes, including heavy borrowing from other religions.

On the other hand again, postmodern contemporary thought is suspicious of every structure that offers over-arching answers and that demands consistent uniformity. Liturgy has always been a vehicle for the free spirit, even if the forms had to be observed. Piyutim, poetic prayers that take people beyond the established liturgical framework, are an integral part of traditional Jewish worship. Wordless chants may be their contemporary successors.

And as no words are spoken, denominational differences become less pronounced. The need to reach out to God and pour out one's heart in worship may transcend traditional institutions. "Post-denominational" services in chassidic garb are in great demand, even in Reform congregations. Theologies may differ, but the humming is the same.

Each time I feel that my davening is being interrupted and the content of my prayer obscured, I console myself with the thought that, on balance, this may not be as bad as it sounds.

Finding a comfy rock in a hard place

Now that I'm home in Toronto and contrasting Halifax's fresh and crisp air with Toronto's hazy smog, I've come to realize the impact that Mother Nature can have on my mood.

Thinking about nature always gets me thinking about my solo experience on Outward Bound a few years ago, and I wanted to tell my readers about it.

Matthew Pottens in Halifax

Around the week-and-a-half point of my three-week-long Outward Bound adventure, the trip leaders dropped each member of the group off at sites one kilometre apart around a lake. Each trip member was given a tarp, a bug net, rope, and a small bag of dry food consisting of crackers, cheese, trail mix, cookies, granola, and a few other things. We were also given a pen or pencil and an Outward Bound notebook to write in. Other than those items, our sleeping bags and clothes were the only other things we were allowed to bring.

So there I was, a small 17-year-old kid, being dropped off at my solo site, scared, excited and unsure of what I was about to experience.

I spent the first few hours trying to set up a bug-resistant area to sleep in. Using my bug net, tarp and some sticks to provide structure, I created a sleeping area that resembled a coffin. For the rest of the day, until sunset, I spent my time writing and drawing in my journal, pretending to be a ninja with a really great stick I had found, reciting song lyrics and doing anything else that came to mind – being alone in the wilderness can drive you mad!

The daytime was tolerable. The boredom gave me opportunities for self reflection. As the Outward Bound Canada handbook explains, "Solo is a time for self-reflection. It is a time to think about your experiences here at Outward Bound, and your experiences in life in general."

The first night was indeed an experience that I will never, ever forget. At sleep time, I settled into my coffin-shaped bed and excitedly awaited the onslaught of bugs. Unfortunately, when the sun set, the bugs came in the millions, and as determined as I was to fight through a swollen face, ants in my pants, and buzzing in my ears, I only lasted a few minutes before I jumped up in a rage and destroyed my failure of a bed with my ninja stick, then ran toward the water, where I prayed the bugs would be less dense.

I tied some rope around my wrists and ankles to prevent bugs from entering my clothes, and I tucked my pants into my socks. I found a pretty comfy rock to lie on, and I lay alone under the stars, pondering life, until dawn. While the night was brutal at times, it was a great experience overall. I was able to overcome the bed-and-bug disaster and actually enjoy myself.

I watched the sunrise and was happy to have survived the night. I spent most of the next day writing my thoughts in my journal. I also spent some time exploring the vast wilderness behind me and the water in front of me.

The wilderness seemed risky, since my only weapon was a whistle, so I decided to go for a swim. The water didn't seem very clean on this small lake, and once I was submerged in it, the thought of leeches crept into my mind. I jumped out, and sure enough, I found two new, and juicy, friends attached to my leg. I scraped them off, and after squishing them for a while, I decided to keep them around as company.

I must not have been the best host, because they slithered away into the water soon afterward.

The second night was fine. I remained on my rock, which seemed to have a Matthew Pottens groove in it. Or maybe it was my back that had the groove of the rock in it.

Either way, other than a rainstorm during the night, I slept like a baby and was picked up the next day by the trip leaders. I survived my solo experience and emerged as a changed young man.

The con of the century

As final exam season comes to a close, students can finally celebrate the end of another year of university. For some, this is the end, with graduation and real life to follow. They are now officially grown up – with a degree, perhaps an extremely significant other, and maybe some idea of what they want to do with their lives to show for it. If you are one of these people, I wish you sincere congratulations.

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

But most of us students are not in this position. We have survived another year, hopefully with our sanity and in some semblance of health. For the most part, the stress is over. There are no more exams and no more assignments. We no longer have to get up early to catch the bus, and we don't have to listen to the buzzing drone of our professors.

But life is not all carefree.

We have anxiety about the final exams and assignments we've just turned in. We worry about whether we got the B+ or the A, and we've already calculated what grades we need on these assignments (to the umpteenth decimal point) to get the minimum mark that our meagre self-respect requires. Now that the work is done, there's nothing to do but sit and worry – something we're very good at, since we learn it from our mothers.

For some, this is not the end of the school year. The poor souls who are stuck in spring session will subject themselves to smaller doses of the same stuff that almost drove them to madness and exhaustion. Perhaps they think they'll build up a resistance to it. Perhaps they failed a class and have no choice in the matter. Perhaps homework is something they use to ward off boredom. Perhaps they simply enjoy pain.

But the most important issue of all is money. The question is no longer "What are you going to do when you grow up?" but "When are you going to get off your butt and get a job?". We hand out resumes to everyone we meet in the hope that someone needs a poor university student for work. Soon, total strangers will judge us based on the content of a single document, one that's not very long and outlines everything of value we've ever done in our lives, such as line dancing and fly fishing (two unrelated, yet important, pastimes).

If you're lucky, you'll get paid to repeat a task over and over again. What task? That depends on your resume. I advise you to never put anything you dislike doing on your resume. Avoid activities that smell or require picking up heavy things, such as farming or bowling (two completely unrelated, yet important, activities).

Finding work is important for more than getting your family to stop nagging you. It costs obscene amounts of money to go to university, not to mention to eat, live and buy incidentals such as underwear and lunch (two completely unrelated, yet important, items). Money is also of vital importance to parents, who probably co-signed any student loans you have, or are paying for your tuition. If you don't save some money, they ask, how will you put a down payment on a house, a wedding, your children's future, a piano (because even if you don't play, you need one in your living room), or a million other things you're trying not to think about too much?

It's a good thing that, in general, university students like to work, because people pay you money when you have a real job. That money becomes yours, and you don't need to worry about homework. At university, you pay the school money so you can take notes in class, then you read (unpaid) and do your assignments, and you aren't financially compensated for any of it. When you're done, you've paid the university thousands of dollars, someone hands you a piece of paper, and you never speak again.

This sounds like a good con to me. If I could sell single sheets of paper for thousands of dollars, I wouldn't have to go to university or get a real job.

Can I interest you in some high quality, vintage card stock?

The Kirshner File

Letter from Israel

Friends in central Tel Aviv invited my wife and me to breakfast, and as we walked to the hip restaurant of their choice around the corner, they raved about its scrumptious bagels and rolls and and its delicious mouth-watering selection of cheeses, smoked salmon, herring, olives and mixed salads.

Sheldon Kirshner in Tel Aviv

As we talked in the early morning sunshine of a typical spring day on Israel's temperate coastal plain, I looked forward to this meal.

The restaurant, sleek, airy and spacious, was impressive, as if one of the finest architects in Tel Aviv had designed it.

The menu ran on for several laminated pages, but I did not linger long. Knowing what I wanted, I ordered my usual: café au lait and a toasted sesame bagel with pressed cottage cheese and lox, garnished with thin slices of red onions and complemented by a plate of cracked green olives.

Culinary heaven, as far as I was concerned. But my gustatory dream was immediately shattered.

"Sorry, we don't have pressed cottage cheese," the server said.

My face fell.

"We do have cream cheese," he added tentatively.

I was disappointed, but settled for cream cheese. Still, I could not banish the thought that an important ingredient in my breakfast was sorely missing.

Sensing my mood, Ida, one of our friends who had recently visited Toronto, tried to cushion the blow. "I've shopped everywhere in Tel Aviv, but haven't been able to find pressed cottage cheese."

Ida's comment was mollifying, but the glaring absence of Canadian-style pressed cottage cheese in Israel's coolest, most cosmopolitan city stuck in my throat.

I have no way of vouching for Ida's claim that pressed cottage cheese is an alien commodity in Tel Aviv. For all I know, it can be purchased in, say, the Carmel market. But despite my disappointment on the gastronomic front, Israel has little to be ashamed of in its headlong quest to modernize itself.

From a simple, somewhat austere society prior to 1967, Israel has morphed into a complex, fast-paced consumer country rife with the trappings of 21st-century modernity.

Like other countries, Israel has paid a heavy price for its progress. Far too many Israelis struggle below the poverty line and have not reaped the benefits of Israel's boom. Yet one must not scoff at progress.

Tel Aviv's evolving skyline, bristling with a profusion of skyscrapers, a sight best appreciated as your plane descends for a landing at Ben-Gurion Airport, is but one manifestation of this startling phenomenon.

Once upon a time, not too long ago, the Mayer building in southern Tel Aviv was Israel's sole skyscraper. Built in the mid-1960s, the tower was a landmark that could be seen from almost anywhere in the city. Standing on its rooftop platform in the sky, you had an unobstructed view of one of the liveliest cities in the Mediterranean basin.

Today, the Mayer tower has been eclipsed by a galaxy of taller, bolder buildings, one of which is the stylish tower conceived by Canadian developer and urban visionary David Azrieli, a Polish-born Israeli from Montreal.

In adjacent Ramat Gan, an Iraqi Jewish redoubt hit hard by Iraqi Scud missiles during the 1991Gulf War, several distinctive skyscrapers, including the gleaming Sheraton Hotel, also brighten the skyline.

Gone are the days when Tel Aviv was a low-lying city of only Bauhaus, Arabic and Ottoman buildings.

These skyscrapers have revolutionized Tel Aviv's overall appearance, but if there is one single symbol of Israel's ascent into the ranks of a first-world economy, it is the new and improved Ben-Gurion Airport, just a 20-minute drive from Tel Aviv.

Positively cavernous, and clad in Jerusalem stone, marble and glass, the airport is a marvel of beauty and efficiency, and is Israel's face to the world.

Forty years ago, when relatively few Israelis travelled overseas and were burdened with a punitive departure fee that taxed their tolerance, Israel's national airport in Lod was a small, intimate, smoky affair, a leftover from the British Mandate era.

As tourism boomed and increasing numbers of Israelis went abroad on vacation, not only once or twice in a lifetime, the airport building was supplanted by a bigger, more sumptuous terminal that seemed to signify Israel's coming of age.

The newest incarnation of Ben-Gurion Airport, which opened last year after several delays, represents the last word in architecture and design and is a quantum jump in Israel's self-image as a modern nation attuned to the latest trends.

The second Palestinian uprising, which continues to flare up despite a shaky truce, has partially disrupted the flow of foreign tourists to Israel, and as a result, the airport has not been used to its fullest capacity.

But if the Arab-Israeli conflict can be defused, much less resolved one of these days, the tourist trade will greatly benefit, as will the airport.

The road leading to the airport is wide and smooth and conforms to international standards, like the newest highways cutting across Israel.

Tel Aviv's new skyscraper skyline

The late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin is best remembered for his efforts to forge an historic rapprochement with the Palestinians under the Oslo peace accords. But who knows that Rabin took the first steps to radically upgrade Israel's web of highways?

Clearly marked by green overhead signs, the roads have rendered Israel still smaller by virtue of the time a driver saves by driving from point A to B.

Tel Aviv's Ayalon expressway, which has been flooded by winter downpours on occasion, has eased congestion to a considerable degree.

The trip from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem has been reduced to about 45 minutes, and the ride down to Be'er Sheva from Tel Aviv can be done in just under an hour. From Tel Aviv, you can reach Netanya – a new hub of the high-tech industry - in approximately 30 minutes.

Meanwhile, the old Haifa-to-Tel Aviv road, which bypasses a kibbutz where I lived briefly in 1971, has been widened by several lanes.

Thanks to the revolution in road construction and the rise of a solid middle class in Israel, the ownership of cars has multiplied.

There was a period, before the Six Day War, when a car was generally regarded as an unattainable luxury, but the traffic jams in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, which fray tempers especially in summer, belie that reality.

With the upsurge in automobile sales, pollution has grown incrementally worse and parking spots in major cities are practically worth their weight in gold.

If you leave your car at home, try the intercity commuter train. The trains are clean and comfortable and invariably run on schedule. My wife and I, having no access to a car on this day, boarded the Be'er Sheva-bound train on a Sunday morning.

But true to my sister-in-law's warning, the train was packed, filled to the brim with young soldiers returning to their bases, and a seat was hard to find. The soldiers, dressed casually in loose-fitting olive and blue uniforms, carried assault rifles or submachine-guns.

Their presence reminded me, yet again, that Israel is a nation under siege and cannot take its existence for granted.

Since Palestinian suicide bombers began blowing up themselves and their intended victims in crowded places, armed sentries have been posted at shops, restaurants, train stations and public institutions.

The demand for such personnel has fuelled the growth of a cottage industry. According to an estimate in the Israeli press, 100,000 such guards are employed in Israel today.

Usually, a guard inquires whether you are carrying weapons. If the answer is no, he lets you pass after a cursory inspection of your briefcase or knapsack. In some cases, however, the guard shoos you through without the formality of an inspection.

If you are an Arab, the procedure is far more stringent.

By no stretch of the imagination have Israelis accustomed themselves to the wave of suicide bombings. These attacks started in 1994 following Baruch Goldstein's murderous rampage in Hebron, during which he killed 29 Arabs, and re-erupted in 2001 in the second year of the current intifadah.

Of late, the bombings have subsided, but the spectre of a bomber snuffing out your life in a flash is indeed sobering.

Fortunately, the looming terrorist threat has not quenched the usual joie de vivre of Israelis.

Israelis try to live life to its fullest, in a country where anything can happen at any time.

Walk With Israel seen as strong response to international threats

Community urged to support Israel on May 28

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

Israel is a "fake regime" that "cannot logically continue to exist," Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said in a televised press conference on April 24.

Ahmadinejad has repeatedly questioned Israel's right to exist, and has threatened to wipe Israel off the map.

The co-chairs of this year's UJA Federation Walk With Israel, which will take place on Sunday, May 28, are calling on the community to show its support for Israel in the wake of these comments, by participating in this year's Walk.

"In light of the current rhetoric from the President of Iran calling for the complete annihilation of Israel, suggesting that Jews leave Israel and return to their European countries of origin, and in light of the fact that Hamas openly declares and justifies its terrorist intentions, now more than ever, it is absolutely critical to stand behind Israel, the only democracy in the Middle East, the only homeland for the Jewish people," says Walk co-chair Sara Zagdanski.

Zagdanski and her co-chairs Felicia Posluns and Nelly Zagdanski say that the Walk With Israel is the perfect venue to express support for Israel.

"We have to show the happiness, the joy in our community, the pride we have in Israel," says Posluns. "We have to always remind the world that we are together, and remind Israel that we are there. The more people who continue to come together and are happy with being Jewish, the stronger we will be."

"I'll be coming out to this year's Walk With Israel for sure," says Toronto's Nancy Klein. "Although it's always a fun event, when you hear hateful comments about Jews and Israel like those made by the Iranian president, it makes it even more important to come out and show our support."

The UJA Federation Walk With Israel will be held – rain or shine – on Sunday May 28th, and will take to the streets at 10:30 a.m. from Coronation Park (across from the CNE Princes' Gates) to the RioCan Carnival at Ontario Place. Registration begins at 9:30 a.m. The annual event raises money for children at risk around the world.

"It's critical that the Jewish community comes out to show our support," says Nelly Zagdanski. "We don't live in Israel; this is our only way to show the people of Israel that the community here in Canada supports them."

Read all about it: giant Jewish Public Library book sale

Got some extra space on your bookshelves?

The Jewish Public Library is culling its collection, and is offering the community an opportunity to purchase its excess books at a giant book sale.

The sale will feature more than 10,000 books, records and religious texts in both English and Hebrew. The library is preparing for renovations as part of the newly-created Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge & Heritage. When the renovation is completed, the Latner Centre will house a new and improved Jewish Public Library, and the Media Centre and the pedagogic centre. The library will continue to feature the Anita Ekstein Holocaust Resource Library.

"It's appropriate that the Latner Centre is recognizing that these are books given to the community by the community, and they're going back to the community," says volunteer chair Gaela Mintz.

Mintz says she'll be looking for books by Philip Roth or other Jewish fiction writers, and notes that the sale will include a wide variety of material.

The items chosen for the sale include books removed from the library shelves which are either duplicates, out of date, or no longer used, and surplus items that have been donated to the library by the public.

While some books will be specially marked, most will carry a price tag of $1. The proceeds from the sale will help the library reenergize its collection.

The book sale will take place Sunday, May 14 from 2 p.m. until 5 p.m. and Monday, May 15 and Tuesday, May 16, from noon until 8 p.m. on the fourth floor of the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst Street.

Mission to Poland uncovers common Jewish challenges

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

A dozen Torontonians recently traveled 7,000 kilometers to Poland, but despite the distance, they found that young Jews – wherever they may live – share some common issues, including that of living Jewishly.

"Many of the Polish youngsters we met with at the Jewish Community Centre in Poland only found out that they were Jewish in their adolescence, or even as late as in their adulthood," says mission participant, Gary Siepser, UJA Federation's senior vice president, community planning and engagement. "Many of them are now struggling with what that Judaism means, and how they can live Jewish lives."

Siepser's comments were echoed by fellow mission participant Joseph Lebovic who also spoke with several of the young people.

"While we have an obligation to financially support the Jewish elderly of Poland, the question is how we do we help the younger generations," said Lebovic. "One option is sending them on birthright israel programs where they can learn about their background and be proud of Jewish accomplishments. They need to be taught about their heritage and about Israel so that they are not scared and have a sense of security. Once they have this background they can decide whether they are confident enough to remain in Poland as a Jew or leave for other countries which are more hospitable."

All of those who took part in this unique mission had something in common as well - familial roots in Poland.

According to Susan Fenwick, who, along with her husband Allan, made the sojourn to Poland, the Discovery Mission was appropriately named.

"Discovering our roots in Poland; visiting the death camps of Auschwitz and Birkenau; learning from the people in Poland who want to be Jewish; spending time with soldiers and new olim who want to be in Israel; seeing the elderly, talking to the people, it was an eye-opening time for us," says Fenwick, chair of the mission along with George Grossman and Ron Appleby.

Highlights of the mission included a tour of historic sites in Warsaw which tell of the role played by Warsaw's Jewish community in the 19th and early 20th centuries; a visit with the Chief Rabbi of Poland, Michael Shudrich, and a meeting with Jewish students at the Jewish Community Centre.

For participant Donald Carr, the experience of visiting Auschwitz-Birkenau was particularly moving.

"It's not until, with great trepidation, you touch the wooden slats of the 'beds' in the deserted barracks, walk into the cellar torture cells, feel the rubble of the crematoria in between your fingers, stand next to a field covering the ashes of untold thousands, and listen to the first-hand story of an 80 year-old survivor, who was forced to burn the twisted bodies of his own people, that you can even partially begin to imagine the unrecountable horror and degradation that was Birkenau and Auschwitz," said Carr.

Comprehensive study reveals high quality of Jewish life in Greater Toronto

UJA Federation releases omnibus report on Toronto's Jewish community

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA Federation

Members of Toronto's Jewish community are strongly committed to Jewish education and they're less inclined to marry outside the faith. Conservative Judaism is the most popular affiliation option and synagogue membership is relatively high. Attending a Passover seder and lighting Chanukah candles are important priorities; however, keeping kosher both inside and outside the home is less stringently observed. Nearly three quarters of survey respondents have visited Israel – almost 80% feel "very close," or "somewhat close" to Israel - and roughly an equal percentage believes that antisemitism exists in Toronto.

This is a portrait of Jewish Life in Greater Toronto, a new, all-encompassing UJA Federation study, authored by Charles Shahar and Tina Rosenbaum, about the attitudes of Jewish community members, based on a questionnaire completed by 654 adult respondents.

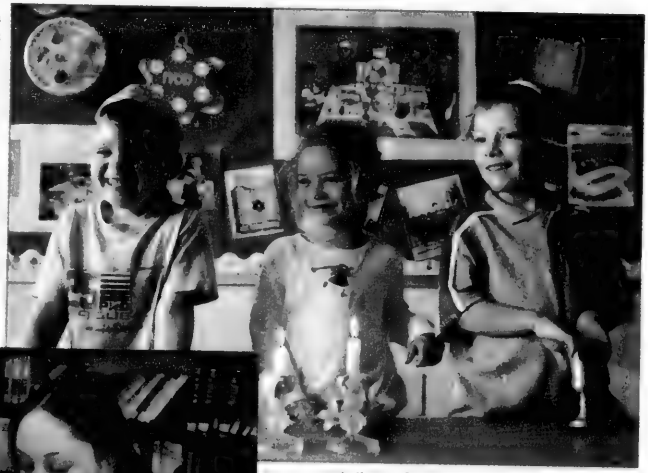
- Nearly 37% of respondents define themselves as Conservative, 18.7% as Reform, 14.2% as Orthodox, 16.4% as "just Jewish," 6.8% as secular and 1.7% as Reconstructionist. The percentage of people who identify themselves as Orthodox is the third largest in North America.
- Nearly 50% of respondents indicate they are paying members of a synagogue but singles, recent immigrants and individuals with low incomes are among the least likely to belong.
- Just over a third of respondents (34.2%) with school age children send their children to Jewish day schools - North America's second highest day school attendance figure behind Montreal. Nearly half (48.3%) of parents whose children were not attending day school are giving their kids a supplementary Jewish education.
- Just over 11% of respondents who are married or living together say their spouse was not Jewish. That figure represents North America's third lowest intermarriage level. However, more than a quarter of respondents (28.6%) say their children married non-Jews, almost 60% of singles say they would consider marrying non-Jews and a little less than 30% of intermarried respondents are providing an exclusively Jewish upbringing for their children. Yet a third of intermarried respondents, whose children do not attend day school are giving their children a supplementary Jewish education.
- Approximately one of every seven respondents reports a member of the household who has special needs.

"Jews residing in Greater Toronto enjoy a very high quality of Jewish life," notes Charles Shahar. "However, the current findings also suggest a number of important challenges facing the community involving segments that seem less involved with the Jewish mainstream."



Among those living on the fringes of Jewish life, he says, are individuals with homes or apartments in non-traditional Jewish areas, who are "least likely to give their children a Jewish education and most likely to have children who intermarry."

Shahar suggests small grassroots organizations that promote community building in these areas and satellite services for Jewish residents.

UJA Day at the Ballpark

Despite a loss to the Boston Red Sox, the recent UJA Day at the Rogers Centre was a huge hit with the community as more than 2,000 UJA Federation supporters and baseball spectators participated in the special day. Receiving the cheque on behalf of UJA Federation are (l-r) Jeff Springer, UJA Federation campaign director; Fred Waks and Ariella Rohringer, chairs of Campaign 2007; David Engel, chair of the Board; UJA Federation, and Arr-Yeah the Lion, the friendly mascot of UJA Federation's Walk With Israel, taking place on Sunday, May 28.

Toronto loses devoted volunteer

David Stokes was everyone's friend

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

David Stokes, who passed away on April 23 at the age of 85, dedicated almost 40 years of his life to volunteer work for the Toronto Jewish community.

Stokes, a native of Doncaster, England who came to Toronto in 1967, was an active and enthusiastic volunteer with UJA Federation for decades, having started as a door-to-door canvasser until he became a regular fixture at UJA Federation telethons. Even during his supposed vacations down south, Stokes found the time to offer his services at various telethons at the Jewish Federation of Pinellas County in Florida where he and his wife Sylvia were presented with a volunteer of the year award.

A long-time member of Toronto's Beth Tikvah Congregation, Stokes was an active member of the synagogue's Chesed Committee, and he volunteered for the Chaplaincy Service of Jewish Family & Child Service - a UJA Federation partner organization - where he spent countless hours visiting the sick and elderly in hospitals. He also volunteered with the Jewish War Veterans at Sunnybrook Hospital.

"I first met David Stokes at what else – a telethon, and I immediately was drawn to his warm and welcoming smile," recalls David Engel, chair of the Board, UJA Federation. "He was one of those rare people who, even though you may have never met, had the ability to make you feel like you're old friends. He truly epitomized the spirit and generosity of Jewish Toronto. I'll really miss him at the next telethon. He was a great ambassador for Toronto," notes Engel.

David Stokes

"David always made the time to help others, without any thought of recognition," says Dodi Weill, a family friend of the Stokes. "He was a truly decent man, a devoted father to two sons, zeda to four grandchildren, and a loving husband of 53 years to Sylvia."

"David epitomized everything that volunteerism stands for," says UJA Federation President and CEO, Ted Sokolsky. "He was our volunteer of volunteers and he will be missed. The joy and passion he brought with him to the Lipa Green Building was truly infectious, and that menshlechkeit (sense of decency) rubbed off on those around him. David Stokes was a true mensch."

"It wasn't just the countless hours that David devoted to us as a volunteer, it was the joy with which he volunteered," says Howard English, vice president, Marketing & Communications, UJA Federation. "He was delighted to contribute his time and, in turn, everyone else was delighted to be around him. We'll miss his selfless, sunny outlook on life."

Palliative care fundraiser embraces life

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Four-year-old Samantha always loved unicorns, even before she developed brain cancer.

"Why do you love unicorns so much?" her mother, Robyn Posen Young, once asked Samantha after she got sick.

"Unicorns mean we never die," Samantha replied. "They mean that we go on forever."

Samantha would be 14 now. She died nine years ago.

But Samantha's unicorns are helping other children through the annual Unicorn Dream Dinner, a fundraiser for the new Max & Beatrice Wolfe Children's Centre for Grief and Palliative Care, to be held this year on May 11 at Spirale Banquet and Convention Centre.

Opened in September 2005 and operating in association with Mount Sinai Hospital's Temmy Latner Centre for Palliative Care, the Wolfe Centre provides end-of-life care to children and their families – offering active and compassionate therapies, physical, psychological and spiritual, to reduce symptoms and suffering.

"When you lose a child, it's beyond devastating," says Posen Young, who still misses hearing Samantha's footsteps and her chirpy good nature.

"She didn't complain once," Posen Young said, despite treatments that were often worse than the disease itself.

The first operation made Samantha a paraplegic. "Her body was devastated. She couldn't do anything on her own." Blind in one eye, deaf in one ear, catheterized, without the use of her hands, bloated from steroids, Samantha wouldn't look in a mirror anymore, but she "always had a smile on her face."

Samantha finally died, not of cancer, but from her treatments, in a way that will always haunt her mother.

Last-ditch medical interventions left her "convulsing in a semi-conscious state, blood spurting out of her nostrils and her mouth," says Posen Young. "It was a horror. It was not the way somebody should die, especially a child."

Pediatric palliative care is all about how children should die, a subject few of us, even medical professionals, want to face.

"It's hard for pediatricians and other child care workers," says Latner Centre director Dr. Larry Librach. Parents often receive few answers, or even false optimism. "Nobody wants to see a kid die."

Posen Young agrees.

"From the beginning, nobody would tell us exactly what was happening. The attitude was to… not even think of the negative."

But in reality, there was no hope. "[Samantha] had a brain stem brain tumour. She wasn't going to survive."

Palliative care works within the confines of that terrible reality.

"We can accept that a child is going to die," says Librach.

Most of the centre's children have cancer, though he's quick to point out that pediatric cancers often have a fairly good prognosis."About three-quarters will be cured," he notes.

For the other one-quarter, acceptance means providing "comfort and care and family support" – improving the quality of those final weeks and days.

Like adults, children want to be home for as long as they possibly can.

Currently, Librach says, about 80 per cent of child cancer patients "will go on to die in hospital," but if it were up to families, "they'd be able to die at home."

With the child at home, the family can maintain daily routines, rather than interrupting everything or taking turns staying at the hospital. The centre helps parents in this caregiver role and offers a 24-hour telephone support line that can prevent emergency room visits.

The centre also supports siblings, who are often overlooked, as well as children with a terminally ill parent.

"Kids need the opportunity to be able to speak about death and dying," Librach says. "I'm always surprised… [kids] have incredible feelings around this."

Death is still a taboo topic, he adds, and we certainly don't want to discuss it with our children, even though "kids can help the adults cope with their grief."

Posen Young says Samantha never told her, "I know I'm dying, Mommy," but she began asking questions such as, "How do you become a ghost?"

At the time, Posen Young found few resources to help her cope, but she has since written two children's books, Samantha's Unicorn and Jamie's Rainbow, to offer kids honest answers.

The Wolfe Centre is urgently needed, Posen Young says, so that other children don't have to die as Samantha did, frightened and in pain.

Although OHIP pays for medical treatments, many other services are not covered.

"We don't have a lot of resources," Librach says. "There's no funding for an art therapist, no funding for specialized counsellors, no funding for a child life specialist…we have to rely on donors."

From a "little dinner," it has snowballed over its four-year history into an annual gala that has raised more than $300,000.

Tickets for this year's event are $150. Call Faye Librach at 416-651-4419 for details.

Reporter takes Shoah documentary to school

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Naomi Parness, a reporter on the Barrie-based A-Channel (formerly the New VR), is the granddaughter of Holocaust survivors and grew up hearing their stories, but she said there really is no way to prepare for a trip like the one she took last year to Poland with March of the Living.

Her half-hour documentary for the station, March of the Living, which first aired last year as a five-part series, recently won the regional Edward R. Murrow award for best news series from the Radio-Television News Directors Association, the Canadian branch of an international electronic media professional organization.

Although Parness travelled to Poland as a journalist, the trip galvanized her on a personal level. Since her return, she has joined the Holocaust Centre of Toronto's Holocaust Education Week committee, and has started taking her documentary to schools.

Last week, she was at United Synagogue Day School's Richmond Hill branch with her documentary as part of a Yom Hashoah service, and she has spoken at Ryerson University, where she studied radio and television arts. Also, a number of schools have used the film as an educational tool.

"You can't sit back," she said.

Parness, 25, told The CJN that she sees stories like the one she did about March of the Living as a way to use "journalism to combat the evil of hate."

She pitched the idea for the documentary three months after joining the channel, writing "a pretty long proposal" that detailed why the story was important. Her timing was good: she would be accompanying a group of York Region politicians on the trip and the station was just moving into the area. Also, last year marked the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II.

"Obviously there was a huge interest worldwide, and there was particular interest in Toronto and York region," said Bob McLaughlin, the station's manager of news and operations.

Naomi Parness

"I thought it was a very unique project," he said. "These are stories that really need to be told, and that really connect with the audience. It was a very ambitious project for us, and an expensive one, but it was going to be too powerful not to do."

Walking through the concentration camp at Auschwitz with Holocaust survivor Max Eisen, who showed her where he slept and where he said good-bye to his father for the last time, "really made it very real," she said.

"It was very difficult for me," added Parness, who had never been to Poland. "Going as a journalist, I couldn't cry as much as I would have – you have to separate yourself from the story. I had to compose myself [to be on camera]. I did a lot of crying when I got home."

She is very pleased about receiving the award – it's "fantastic," she said – but what's more important, she said, is the "reason it's an important piece for me.

"I've made it my personal mission not to forget."

Survivors, war veterans join trek to Ottawa

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Conducting evening prayers in a Belleville, Ont., parking lot and later singing along to a chorus of Jerusalem of Gold on a chartered bus at 10 p.m. felt like nothing out of the ordinary for a group of Holocaust survivors and Jewish war veterans.

"We have to celebrate every day, in every way we can," said Nancy Kleinberg, who took a day-long journey with her husband Howard and grandson Aryeh Samuel, a 15-year-old student at Yeshivat Or Chaim, to attend last week's Canadian Holocaust Memorial Day ceremony in Ottawa.

Kleinberg, 77, who came to Canada from Poland in 1947, two years after she was liberated from Bergen-Belsen, said her family journeyed from Toronto to Ottawa on one of two full-to-capacity buses, organized by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, because "we felt compelled. We've lived [all these years since the war]. We have to acknowledge it."

The couple's story is a particularly poignant one, Nancy said. "I saved [Howard's] life. I was out looking for my family after liberation [she didn't know yet that they had all perished] and I saw him lying on the side of the road among a pile of corpses. I could see he was alive – but just barely.

"I had courage then, and I wanted to do a good deed. I [dragged him with me] and nursed him for three weeks until the military took him to the hospital."

They didn't see each other for two years, she says, until Howard came to Toronto and found out that she was also here.

"We've been married now 56 years. We have four children and 11 grandchildren. To save one person is to save a generation," Nancy said.

Howard, a semi-retired businessman, was particularly moved by the Ottawa ceremony, he said, because so many Canadian officials took part.

"My family made application to come to Canada [before the war], and they rejected my father because he had been sick and weighed too little. My mother did not want to leave him."

Joe Shedletzky, 81, a retired butcher, and the Jerusalem of Gold soloist on the bus ride, lost his father, mother and younger sister in the Holocaust. "I ran away on Dec. 25, 1941, and I remember hiding out in the cornfields, cooking carrots and potatoes over a fire. I ate so I could survive."

He attended the Ottawa ceremony for the second time, he said, "because we have to show people we are a nation. Wherever Jews congregate, we should all go."

Mitzie Weber took the bus ride with her daughter and son-in-law Debbie and Steven Weiner, and her son and daughter-in-law Geoffrey and Anna Weber, in honour of her husband Jacob, who died this past December.

Jacob Weber was born in Czechoslovakia and although he arrived in Montreal as a young boy, he was actively involved in the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, the Association for the Soldiers for Israel, and Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, Mitzie said.

Among those who went to Ottawa were Nancy and Howard Kleinberg and their grandson, Aryeh Samuel.

"We were invited to lay a wreath in my father's memory, and my heart is breaking," said Debbie.

"This is a bittersweet moment, though, because [with the Holocaust Memorial Day Act] Canada is finally recognizing the Holocaust on the calendar."

"[We have to remember that] the soldiers stopped the Holocaust. Without the actions of the military, what would have happened?"

Noting that about 60 Jewish war veterans, some from Russia, made the trip from Toronto, Gardner said, "It is important to unite and never forget what happened."

Lou VanDelman, executive director of the Jewish War Veterans, Toronto post, told The CJN that "we gathered here to remember the depth to which man can descend, when hatred and bigotry ruled the day.

"We can't tolerate hatred [no matter who the victim is]. We have the sad experience of knowing what it's like to be targeted. We are the experts," said VanDelman.

Yom Hashoah 5766

We must do more than remember

By JONATHAN LASKI and DANNY RICHMOND

Guest Voice

Last week, we were at Earl Bales Park to bear witness to the Holocaust and remember its victims.

This is something both of us have done for many years as grandchildren of Holocaust survivors, active members of the Jewish community, and concerned citizens of a world that failed the Jewish people 60 years ago.

We were moved by the ceremony to "never forget," but as strong as this year's and past year's events have been, they are simply commemorations of the past.

For us, there was something missing from last week's event, something the Jewish community often fails to emphasize, which could have made the message of Holocaust remembrance all the more relevant.

As thousands of Canadians have come to learn, there is a kind of Shoah occurring right now in the Darfur region of Sudan, in the form of a blatant disregard for humanity that has resulted in the death of more than 400,000 innocent people. And the atrocities continue daily.

In the weeks before Yom Hashoah, we and three dedicated Jewish high school students planned "Scream for Darfur," a rally slated for this past Sunday at Queen's Park to raise awareness about the crisis in Darfur.

Yet our community persists in remembering the Holocaust in isolation. Organizers of last week's Yom Hashoah event did not mention Darfur or the need to act on it, nor did they promote the rally, whose scheduled speakers included MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler and former MP David Kilgour.

This reflects an older generation's way of remembering the Holocaust – revering it as if were a recent death, and caring for it the way we would a recent wound.

With all due respect to the need to "never forget," the Holocaust must be used as a source of inspiration to draw attention to the crises of today.

This is the younger generation's approach, one that comes from a desire to connect our heritage to the world we live in today. Our generation is searching for a way to keep the Shoah alive through its lessons, and by doing so, we will also keep the spirit of its victims and survivors alive.

We can sustain the memory of the Holocaust for our grandparents, but unless we sustain its lessons, what reason does the world have to remember? And what greater way to honour and pay tribute to victims and survivors than by using the stories of their tragedies to prevent new ones from being created?

We are offering this critique because we care. And we believe that scores of young Jews are discouraged and will look to apply their talents, energies and enthusiasm elsewhere, because the Jewish community speaks but does not act, and it's not willing to do everything in its power to make "never again" truly mean "never again."

To paraphrase Stephen Lewis, the United Nations special envoy for HIV/AIDS in Africa, we feel that those who care about something have an ethical responsibility to point out its failings. The Holocaust can be the memory that we, the generation after the darkness, use to inspire us to change the world. Not doing so destroys our credibility as keepers of the "never again" message, both as Canadians and as the Jewish generation after the darkness.

Some early film pioneers

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

Born in the east end of London, leading British cameraman Joe Rosenthal came to Canada about 1900 at the behest of the Canadian Pacific Railway to make Living Canada, a series of film documentaries intended to stimulate immigration. In the process Rosenthal, who also made a dramatized version of Hiawatha while here, became enshrined as Canada's first Jewish film industry pioneer.

Another was Bernard Allen, a jeweller from Pennsylvania whose son Jule came north around 1906 to scout out locations for a motion picture theatre. The Allens built their first theatre in Brantford, Ont., and within 15 years had established a vast international movie circuit. Settling in Toronto, they built some of the city's finest movie palaces, including the Tivoli, Parkdale, College, St. Clair, Beach and Hollywood.

N. L. Nathanson was another American who moved to Toronto. He got started in the movie business by purchasing an old theatre, the Regent on Adelaide St., and converting it into a deluxe movie house. That was in 1916. He eventually teamed up with the American mogul Adolph Zukor, with whom he established the Famous Players chain.

All these names appear in Stars of David, a superb monograph penned half a century ago by author and historian Hye Bossin. Also cited by Bossin as pioneers are Sam Lester and Harry Alexander – my father's uncles – and their partner Morris Mentel. Beginning in 1909, the trio "ran a little cloak-and-suit manufacturing business" by day and operated some of Toronto's first motion picture houses by night.

As Bossin notes, two more Lesters, George (Angell) and Harry, were also movie pioneers. A generation later, George's sons, Lionel and Robert Lester, both entered the business, and Lionel became a major force in the world of film distribution.

A wonderful old photo, probably dating from the WWI era, shows Mentel, Sam Lester and Alexander outside one of their (and Toronto's) earliest theatres. At various times, they and their various associates and relations operated the Park, Royal, King, U-Kum, Dufferin, Bonita and the Doric (where my great-grandfather, David Alexander, tended the candy counter, to his grandchildren's everlasting delight).

In a memoir written around 1991, Lionel recalled the Royal Theatre, which operated during World War I: "Admission was 10 cents and one cent war tax for adults, and five cents for children… Besides my mother who sold tickets and my dad who collected them at the door, there was the projectionist and the piano player. The piano player watched the picture very carefully in order to play the proper music to fit the scene."

Phyllis Bryce still recalls her father Sam Lester's first theatre, situated in a little store on Dovercourt Road. "I can still picture it. He had a little projector and a white sheet that he used as a screen."

Are there significant pioneers in your family tree? Their stories are as fleeting as flickering lights on a screen, celluloid impressions lasting but a moment.

We owe it to future generations to try to preserve their history.

A divisive way to take a stand

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

The Toronto Board of Rabbis (comprised mainly of Conservative and Reform clergy) has chosen to withdraw its endorsement of (read boycott) the Toronto Jewish community's annual Yom Hashoah commemoration. At issue is a decision by the event's steering committee to include in the programming only the male members of an otherwise mixed children's and youth choir.

The timing of this decision coincided with the public Torah reading of the Shirah, the song. After God's miraculous splitting of the sea for the Israelites, we read, "Then Moses and the children of Israel sang" (Exodus 15:1). In spontaneous and prophetic response, the narrative continues: "And Miriam took the drum in her hand, and all the women followed her with drums and dancing" and they sang to HaShem (Exodus15:20).

There was a men's choir and there was a separate women's choir. This is the Torah way of propriety and reverence for the feminine form. In song and dance, women are not for the entertainment of men.

The crux of this issue, according to the TBR, is that this halachic concern about hearing female vocalists is not one shared by the community and, therefore, is not representative of the community.

I, for one, disagree.

Firstly, I should like to point out that religion in general, and halachah in particular, is in no way meant to mirror the norms of the masses, but rather to present people with an ideal to aspire to.

To do the reverse – constantly adjusting ideals to match societial norms – is not religion, but an exercise in absurdity. Would the rabbis of the TBR consider abolishing prayer in all their synagogues, since the vast majority of their members choose not to participate in Shabbat services (much less in weekday services)? Obviously not, as they, too, wish to offer their members an ideal to aspire to and hope that they will participate.

Some of the TBR rabbis choose not to abide by the laws of kashrut. Nevertheless, all of their gatherings and events do adhere to the laws of kashrut. Would these rabbis not agree that a community event should be similarly structured according to halachah, and that this would in no way be an affront to anyone?

Everyone (including the TBR) believes that a communal service should be inclusive. It pains me that the TBR has taken this stance, and that the community is essentially witness to a group of rabbis protesting halachah.

It is also painful that they should choose (unanimously, yet!) to make this protest over a Holocaust commemoration. One would have hoped that the enormity of the Holocaust, the sacred memory of six million martyrs, the honour of the survivors, and our responsibility to remember the past and educate our children, would override partisan politics.

That the president of the TBR would draw a parallel between the prohibition of kol ishah (hearing a woman sing) and the murder of children by the Nazis is incomprehensible, if not outright reprehensible.

Our community, too, is in no way homogenous, and by that I mean fully observant. And yet, within a broad spectrum of observance, this same community demands of its congregations the highest common denominator. In their private lives and in their homes, Sephardim will do what they believe is right for themselves, but in their communal life, nothing but tradition will do.

Jewish Life

How can we measure our lives?

Books
Bernard Baskin

Faust, Goethe's famous drama, concerns a jaded and disaffected man who makes a pact with the devil. The unhappy and bored Faust agrees that if the devil ever provided him with an experience so profound that he wished it would endure, then he would cease to be.

The devil tempted him with manifold wonders, but Faust remained dissatisfied and unyielding. The years pass, and now an old man, he tends a small parcel of swampy land, pushing back the sea by building dikes. In time, the unsightly bog is transformed. Fresh green fields appear, farmers oversee crops and cattle pasture.

Faust loses the contest, but for the first time in his life, he savours the joy of accomplishment – yes, life can be worth living. "Ah, still delay – thou art so fair/ The traces cannot, of my earthly being./ In aeons perish – they are there!/ In proud forefeeling of such lofty bliss,/ I now enjoy the highest moment – this!"

This dramatic episode challenges us: how are we to find that pattern or aspect of life to which we can turn and say, "Ah, still delay – thou art so fair"?

Some of the answers that come to mind appear shallow and wanting. Longevity fails as a measure of life's meaning. Actually, the days of our years are really very few when measured by the long past and the longer future. The Psalmist knew this wisdom when he said, "A thousand years in Thy sight are but as yesterday when they are past."

If merely living long is not a proper measure of life, certainly the accumulation and treasuring of things is vain. Wealth has been likened to a disease. One does not have to advocate the ascetic life of denial to recognize this. Often things soon begin to possess us. We become slaves to them, wasting our lives getting and spending.

If a man got possession of all the gold in the world, he could not buy a friend, character, peace of mind, clear conscience or a sense of eternity.

How can we best measure life? The proper answer flows from spiritual, emotional and intellectual growth.

Scientists teach us that nothing in the universe is finished. We live in a creative universe wherein planets grow, worlds grow, life grows. When anything stops growing, death occurs.

If a seed in its dark, restless journey under ground is not content until it breaks through the mountain of soil and strains ever higher toward the sunlight, shall we human beings be content to remain in the original state of nature?"

Whatever our age, it is a time for us to grow – to become more capable of forgiveness, more sensitive to another's pain, more receptive to criticism, more open to a new idea.

Growth means acceptance of the reality of pain and the implacability with which death looms over life. We always know it is there, but suddenly we wake up and something is wrong; suddenly the doctor calls to talk about our tests. Life swings on a hinge.

Growth means the ability to receive and offer loving kindness.

A chassidic teacher confessed that he learned the meaning of love from overhearing a conversation between two villagers. One asked the other, "Do you love me?"

The other replied, "I love you deeply."

The first asked, "Do you know my friend, what gives me pain?"

The second protested that he could not possibly know.

"If you do not know what gives me pain," lamented the first, "how can you say you love me?"

Growth, then, as a measure of life includes compassion, acceptance, awareness and the successful tilling with energy and joy that small "parcel of ground" that fate has ordained for us. Only then can we perceive the fleeting moment and cry out, "Ah, still delay thou art so fair."

Jewish names, Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Abraham, Isaac, Jacob.
Arik, Itzik, Yarkon.
Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel, Leah.
Sarele, Revital, Raykhke, Lilach.

Your Jewish name says a great deal about you. It hints at when and where you were born, how traditional your parents were when they chose your name – and according to Jewish tradition, it reveals aspects of your personality.

Today, I am going to tell you about some sites where you can learn more about the significance of Jewish names – and next week, we'll visit some great online resources for Jewish baby names.

I had always thought of genealogists being solely preoccupied with family names, but I learned that was not necessarily the case at the always marvellous genealogical site JewishGen.org. The introduction to the Given Names Data Base traces Jewish history and significance of Jewish given names from the biblical period through the 20th century. Prof. G.L. Esterson writes that Jewish tradition has always placed a higher value on someone's first name than on the family name. For example, only the person's first name and father's name have always been key when being called up to the Torah. Similarly, it is a person's first name and nicknames that are crucial to the validity of the divorce document, the get. [http://tinyurl.com/ftg9t]

And a given name can yield vital clues when researching your family tree. That where the database can be quite valuable If you enter an ancestor's given name for his European country of origin, you will find many possible Hebrew, Yiddish and secular names he might have adopted. And that may help give you leads to documentation you may never have considered. For example, if you are working on your family tree and trying to guess what Great-Aunt Fannie's Jewish name was back in Europe, the database suggests it might have been: • Franya, Frumka, Vromot (in Poland); • Feyge, Foygl, Froma (in Hungary); • Fanni, Freydele, Fanya (in Galicia). [http://tinyurl.com/jre42]

The Given Names Data Base focuses on Jews of European origin, so if you have a question about the origin of a Sephardi name, you can join the Sefard Forum E-mail Discussion List. [http:// tinyurl.com/qdapo]

The connection between a name and one's soul has deep kabbalistic roots. Rabbi Paysach Krohn points out that the Hebrew word for soul – neshama – is spelled with the four Hebrew letters nun, shin, mem and hay. Remarkably, the Hebrew word for name, shem – spelled shin, mem – is contained within the word neshama, indicating yet again the strong connection between one's name and one's soul, or essence. [http://tinyurl.com/ndy9e]

Your Jewish name is yours for life and tradition rarely allows it to be changed. One exception is in the case of serious illness. Rabbi Simkha Weintraub quotes the Babylonian Talmud that says that one of the things that "may cause an evil decree passed on a person to be cancelled [is a] change of name." For example, a man who is ill may be given an additional name such as Raphael (God heals), while a woman may be named Brachah (blessing). [http://tinyurl.com/zhw3c]

There is a belief that after death, an angel asks each soul for its Hebrew name. In order to train their soul not to forget, there is a tradition for people to insert a verse that alludes to their name each time they recite the Shmoneh Esrei prayer. For example, if your name is Sarah (spelled "Sin-Raysh-Hay"), you look for the verse that begin with the Hebrew letter "Sin" and ends with the letter "Hay": "Se'oo yedaychem kodesh, u'varcha et HaShem." "Lift your hands in the Sanctuary and bless God." (Psalms 134:2) You can find the traditional verses that correspond to most Hebrew names at the following page. [www.hanefesh.com/edu/name.htm]

Next week, we'll look at some sites that try to help you choose the right Jewish name for a newborn boy or girl, or maybe for yourself if you were never given a Jewish name. Until then, you might want to try out Jacob Richman's My Hebrew Name website. If you are looking for a Hebrew equivalent to a secular name, type yours in and see what you get. When I typed in "Mark," I got back the following suggestions: Makabi, Medan and Mordechai. Not bad (but for the record, my parents went with Moshe.) [www.my-hebrew-name.com/]

Photo exhibit raises funds to aid Katrina victims

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Although she spent more than a week in January repairing the roofs of Mississippi homes damaged by Hurricane Katrina last summer, Ninat Friedland decided that she wanted to do more to help the victims who are still struggling to rebuild their lives.

Friedland, a 21-year-old visual arts and psychology student at York University, helped organize a photo exhibit and a silent auction of the pictures to raise money for the victims of Hurricane Katrina.

The exhibit of photographs taken by student volunteers last summer, titled "Reconstructing Mississippi: A Photo Documentary of Interfaith Relief Work," was put together in the hope of raising money for a community still in desperate need of aid, Friedland said.

She said she was inspired to organize this event after she took part in a hurricane relief effort sponsored by Hillel of Greater Toronto that took a group of Canadian students to repair homes in Gulfport, Miss.

"It was a wonderful experience," Friedland said about the trip in January. "We met with other Jewish students across North America. While we were working in Gulfport, we were getting to know the community and it was a great experience connecting with other people.

"We saw how devastated the area was and how badly they needed funds. The trip was so short, and I wanted to do more."

In total, Friedland said that 24 colour, commercial prints that chronicle the Jewish students' experience in Mississippi will be on display at the Propeller Centre for the Visual Arts in downtown Toronto until May 7.

The exhibit and silent auction will continue when it is moved to the Miles Nadal JCC in June.

Friedland said that each photo will start at $50 – but she hopes the pictures will sell for more – with the goal of raising $1,000 for The Interfaith Alliance, an organization that works to promote interfaith co-operation, and creates awareness to encourage a relief effort after each major storm in the United States.

Beth Tikvah Synagogue is pleased to present

Rabbi Emeritus Avraham Feder
in a series of three outstanding programs.

Wed., May 17, 8:00 pm — "A New Era for Israel with Old Hopes and Anxieties"
With changes in political leadership there are uncertainties mixed with expectations. In today's world, normal unpredictability is compounded by national and international intrigue. As Jews in Israel and the Diaspora, what should we look for in the coming year vis-à-vis our enemies, our friends, and our own communities?

Thurs., May 18, 8:00 pm — "Hamlet and Moses: Two Dimensions of Being Human"
A detailed exploration of two of the most famous literary figures in history, and how they deal with aspects of the human predicament. For believing Jews, Moses was and is a real person, whereas Hamlet is a creation of William Shakespeare's imagination. But both men have much to say regarding the struggle to be human.

Mon., May 22, 8:00 pm — "Tears and Laughter of Jewish Life through Song"
Hazzan Tibor Kovari and Linda Segal, with Brahm Goldhamer on piano, will accompany Rabbi Feder on a musical journey of Israel, featuring folk songs highlighting the joys and triumphs and the pathos and yearnings in the face of trial and tragedy, determination and victory.

The Community is invited to attend. There is no charge.

The Rabbi Emeritus Lecture Series

JNF set to honour Manitoba premier

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Rami Kleinmann, the Jewish National Fund (JNF) shaliach for Canada, recalls a Negev Gala here a couple of years ago where he learned of a terror attack in Israel that had killed 19 people.

"I was standing backstage with [Manitoba Premier] Gary Doer," Kleinmann recalled. "I passed on the sad news to him just before he went on stage. What we heard from him that evening was a strong message of commitment to Israel and the Jewish People. In Israel, we value our friends. And we appreciate friends like Gary Doer."

JNF Prairie region president Graham Dixon agrees that Doer, this year's Negev Gala honoree, never hesitates to speak out on behalf of Israel.

Doer was introduced to the JNF Negev Gala campaign team at a kick-off reception on April 25. The gala, scheduled for June 13, is expected to draw more than 1,700 people, Dixon said.

In introducing Doer at the reception, Bob Silver, a gala co-chair, noted that the premier has shown a dedication to all the citizens of Manitoba.

"As a member of the premier's Economic Advisory Council, I have seen first hand Gary Doer's dedication to the betterment of our society and humanity as a whole," said Silver, an owner of the Winnipeg Free Press and president of Western Glove Works, a leading Canadian manufacturer of denim.

Doer, a former labour leader, was elected leader of the NDP in 1987 during an election campaign held just after the highly unpopular NDP government was defeated in the legislature. Although the party took a substantial thrashing at the polls then, the new leader worked hard to rebuild the party's credibility over the next few years. With each election, the NDP's seat totals increased until the party was finally elected to government again in September 1999. Now in his third term as premier, Doer is one of the most popular provincial leaders in Canada.

'We appreciate friends like Gary Doer'

In his address to the Negev Gala campaign team, Doer spoke about the Yom Hashoah ceremony earlier in the day at the Holocaust Memorial on the legislature grounds. He recalled that one of his government's first official acts in 1999 was to establish a Holocaust Memorial Day in Manitoba.

He also spoke of his visit to Israel compliments of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and referred to his moving visit to Yad Vashem.

"On that visit, I gained a greater understanding of Israel's geographic liabilities and the threat facing the country," he recalled. "I saw the Golan Heights and was made aware of the danger from Syria and Hezbollah. It makes my blood boil when I hear about our federal government giving tax credits to Canadians who support Hezbollah or when I see the media trying to provide 'balanced' news coverage where Israel is concerned."

Doer was in Israel just before the American-led invasion of Iraq. He remembered asking some Israeli teens if they were worried about the impending conflict.

"They told me they weren't worried about what was going to happen in two weeks time," he said. "They were more concerned about taking a bus on Saturday night to get pizza and being blown up."

He described being the Negev Gala honoree as a "huge honour," adding, "I am humbled by this honour."

Cobie Brosh, Israel's consul general in Toronto, also addressed the gathering. He commented on the Holocaust memorial ceremony earlier, praising in particular the participation of so many school children.

"Ceremonies like these show the next generation that racism and discrimination are no longer acceptable," he said.

Brosh also cited examples of the JNF's work in Israel, emphasizing the the organization's contribution to the development and well-being of the Jewish State.

The entertainment will be provided by The Voices of Israel – five of Israel's leading female vocalists accompanied by five Israeli musicians.

Funds raised from the gala will be directed to development projects in the Negev.

Some people find Hamas hard to believe

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

When Hamas called the April 17 terrorist attack in Tel Aviv by Islamic Jihad a justifiable act of "self defence," the group was widely condemned in the West. Praising the attack served only to further isolate Hamas from the West.

Canada, the United States and the European Union had already cut off funds and diplomatic ties to the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority. Hamas' defence of the suicide attack, and its ongoing refusal to prevent rocket firings from Gaza into Israel, made this concerted international reaction to Hamas all the more justified in the eyes of most western observers.

But some journalists and analysts still portray Hamas as a potentially pragmatic organization that's willing to compromise and negotiate with Israel.

In "Bombing deepens Hamas rift with Israel" (Globe and Mail, April 18), Orly Halpern interviewed Shaul Mishal, a professor of political science at Tel Aviv University, whom she described as a "Hamas expert."

Mishal said: "Hamas is the most politically schizophrenic situation one could imagine; one must be careful to differentiate now between Hamas the government and Hamas the Islamic movement. They have completely different identities…

"On the one hand, they cannot denounce their official commitment to the military strategy against Israel taken by the Islamic Jihad and the al-Aqsa Brigades. On the other, as government leaders, they have to deal with the problems faced by Palestinian society, by conducting a different, more flexible policy that is ready to negotiate with Israel, and can get financial aid from the European Union, not to mention the U.S."

Mishal added: "[T]he new Israeli government needs to start thinking of Hamas as a government – not only as an enemy, but as a potential partner."

According to most Israeli analysts, however, there is no real distinction between Hamas as a governing authority and as a rigidly ideological Islamic movement. In fact, Hamas spokesmen have recently adopted a uniformly hard-line position. This should leave no doubt that when Hamas claims it will never recognize the "Zionist entity" or prevent attacks on Israel, it's telling the absolute truth.

Nevertheless, there is also a theory that Hamas' uncompromising position is only a reaction to growing international isolation. In "Isolated in its violent corner" (April 22), the Economist promoted this view: "In the early days after coming to power, Hamas had seemed to be reaching out. It tried to form a national unity government with other Palestinian parties, and sent out a series of moderate-sounding messages hinting that under the right conditions, it might abandon its stated goal of destroying Israel. But since this elicited no international response, Hamas reacted by turning ever more belligerent."

In "Hamas: The Last Chance for Peace?" (New York Review of Books, April 26) Henry Siegman wrote in a similar vein. Despite all evidence to the contrary, he argued that Hamas may be a force for moderation, may even respect the rule of law, and could be a negotiating partner for Israel – as long as Palestinian "rights" are respected, though Siegman never questioned what these "rights" are.

Siegman is among the "progressive" voices that apparently refuse to take Hamas at its word: that it cannot abide Jewish sovereignty on "Islamic soil."

A few in Hamas have reportedly said they might accept a long-term ceasefire, as long as Israel returns to the 1967 borders and accepts "right of return" of millions of refugees. But this, of course, would mean the end of Israel's existence as a Jewish state. Most significantly, Hamas has never indicated that it's prepared to accept the three conditions set out by the Quartet: renounce violence, recognize Israel's right to exist, and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian peace agreements.

In the meantime, Hamas' defiance and belligerence has been growing, with important regional implications.

Most Canadian media outlets did not report about Jordan's arrest late last month of several Hamas members who had smuggled weapons in from Syria, reportedly with Syrian involvement and under the guidance of the Syrian-based Hamas leadership of (former Jordanian) Khaled Meshal. The purpose was apparently to carry out attacks in Jordan and destabilize Hashemite rule there.

Canada urged to learn from Israel's high-tech success

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Rob Warren, the director of the University of Manitoba's Asper Centre for Entrepreneurship, said Canada can learn from Israel's success in the high-tech field.

As Israel has done in the high-tech field, Canada needs to develop home-grown venture capital – which is in short supply here – as well as get more government support and forge closer ties between universities and industry, he said.

Warren was the guest speaker at the Winnipeg chapter of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's eighth annual Passover luncheon held at Hotel Fort Garry.

He noted that he was in Israel for the first time last summer and will be returning this month.

"Israel used to be known economically mainly for its oranges and shirts," he said. "But today it is technology that is driving Israel's economy."

That economy, he says, is worth $100 billion (all figures US), more than all of Israel's Arab neighbours put together. Yearly exports, he reported, are about $6.5 billion – with most exports technological products. It was Israelis, Warren pointed out, who invented the cellphone and the first ingestible video camera for doctors looking into patients' gastro-intestinal tract.

"Most Windows systems have been developed in Israeli plants," he said. "The Pentium chip came from Israel, as did the first PC anti-virus software."

The change in Israel's economic focus goes back to the early 1990s. In 1990, agriculture and software each accounted for about $190 million in Israeli exports. Today, agriculture makes up just three per cent of exports, while software exports are in the range of $4 billion a year. Exports have grown by $500 million a year over the past seven years, Warren said.

The change in Israel's economic focus was brought about by an explosive growth of venture capital firms there. In 1990, Israel had one venture capital firm. Today, there are 80. Investment in technology today is 10 times what it was 10 years ago, he said.

He noted that there are currently more than 150 Israeli companies trading on NASDAQ – a figure exceeded only by the United States and Canada – and 38 Israeli companies listed on the European exchange.

The Israeli military is the driving force behind most new technological breakthroughs, Warren said. He also noted that international high-tech companies – including Motorola, Samsung, Sony, IBM, Sysco, Hewlett Packard, GE, British Telecom and Siemens – are either opening plants in Israel or increasingly buying Israeli startup companies.

Israel's high-tech industry has benefited tremendously from the large-scale immigration from the former Soviet Union in the 1990s, he said. Israel has one of the best-educated work forces in the world thanks in part to that immigration, with 140 of every 10,000 Israelis either a scientist or engineer – a figure three times that of Canada and twice that of the United States.

Home-grown venture capital needed

"Twenty-five per cent of Israel's population has a university degree and 12 per cent have advanced degrees," he said. "Only the United States and Holland have higher percentages," Warren said.

And only the United States and Hong Kong have more entrepreneurial startups, he said. "Israel leads the world in new businesses started by people over 55 and by women," he added.

Further supporting Israel's high-tech growth are 19 industrial incubators. The focus today is more and more on biotechnology, Warren said.

Israel's government encourages new business startups through measures such as a 10-year tax holiday for new companies and government-supported training programs for skilled labour.

Warren cautioned that one risk facing Israel's high-tech industry is too much of a reliance on the United States for its exports. He also noted that there is a shortage of experienced managers in Israel.

Brent Schacter, president of the local Hebrew University chapter, said Hebrew U has played an important role in fostering the growth of Israel's high-tech boom.

'We did not learn the lesson from the Holocaust'

Among the speakers were Holocaust survivor Elie Wiesel, Senator Barack Obama and actor George Clooney.

The Queen's Park rally, organized by Project Equity, an effort of five young Jewish students, came a few days after Yom Hashoah, Holocaust Remembrance Day. Legislators in Toronto, Ottawa and Victoria donned green ribbons to link the mass murder of Jews in Europe 60 years ago to today's genocide against the people of Darfur.

A project of Canadian Jewish Congress, which has created a committee to lobby for government action on Darfur, the green ribbon campaign is part of an effort to create awareness of the situation in Darfur, said Bernie Farber, CEO of Congress.

Yahia Mohamed, vice-president of the Darfur Association of Canada, pointed to the parallels between the Holocaust suffered by Jews and the genocide now underway in Darfur. In both cases, he said, "people stood by and did nothing… I think we did not learn the lesson from the Holocaust until now."

Canada, he noted, is dedicated to opposing crimes against humanity, and it should now use its influence to create "a coalition of the willing" to intervene militarily in Darfur to protect people from wholesale slaughter.

Mohamed rejected a statement attributed to Islamic terrorist Osama bin Laden that suggested the Darfur conflict is a religious one. "It was a war against marginalization and underdevelopment by the governments of the north," Mohamed said, adding that the victims, like the janjaweed militia, are also Muslims.

* * *

A few days prior to the rally, members of Temple Emanu-El gathered to hear Epstein and Acol Dor, a survivor of an earlier genocide in southern Sudan, describe the conflict in Darfur. Dor later repeated her story at the rally at Queen's Park.

In southern Sudan, as in Darfur, innocent villagers were murdered and tortured by their countrymen at the behest of the central government in Khartoum, she said.

Dor's personal horror story began when Muslim tribesmen, incited against the south's Christian population, roused her family and began abusing her father. A proud and gentle man, her father had his ears cut off in front of his family and then was forced to watch as one of his daughters was gang raped. He was stabbed multiple times until he died, his corpse left to be eaten by scavenging birds. His family was forced to watch helplessly in horror.

* * *

The Jewish community has a particular role to play in putting the Darfur situation on politicians' radar, Farber told The CJN.

"The Jewish community is the canary in the mine – the early warning system," he said. "We understand the pain of victimization and genocide, and it's up to us to throw a fence of protection around other communities."

The Washington rally was organized by the Save Darfur Coalition, a collection of 150 faith-based advocacy and humanitarian aid organizations initiated by two Jewish agencies,

The Jewish community was widely represented in Washington as well as at the Queen's Park rally. Many of those in Toronto wore kippot and there were signs indicating the presence of Ve'ahavta, a Jewish humanitarian organization; Canadian Young Judaea; and the Lodzer Congregation.

The rally was addressed by organizer David Berkal, former MP David Kilgour, NDP leader Jack Layton, MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler, representatives of three federal parties, Mohamed Haroun, president of the Darfur Association of Canada, and Elfadil Elsharief, president of the Sudanese Canadian Human Rights Association.

Epstein told the rally that the world community has been paralyzed into inaction during the three years of the Darfur crisis. Efforts to arrive at a negotiated settlement have proven fruitless

Associated Press reported Darfur rebels had rejected a peace proposal advanced by the government in Khartoum, which many suspect the government had crafted in order to be rejected – and the UN and the African Union forces have proven unable to stop the human rights abuses.

He suggested three ways Canadians can make a difference:

- the media must cover the story more frequently – at least as much as it did natural disasters like the tsunami and Hurricane Katrina.
- MPs have a moral duty to use their powers to stop the carnage in Africa. "Intervening in Darfur is not a question of right versus left. It is a question of right versus wrong," he said.
- Canadians must not be complacent. "If we are complacent, then we too will be complicit in another genocide."

* * *

In the days before the rally, the congregation at Temple Emanu-El gathered to hear Epstein and other speakers describe the situation in western Sudan.

Epstein said the clique in power in Khartoum had earlier used religion to foment a war against blacks in south Sudan (two million were killed) and are now encouraging ethnic hatred to spur Arab tribesmen to attack the black people of Darfur.

Villagers in Darfur have experienced indiscriminate bombing and killings, their wells have been poisoned and their lands destroyed. Ninety per cent of the area's villages have been wiped out.

Displaced Darfuris are living in camps and are afraid to leave. Women are gang raped, men are murdered if they do try to leave.

"Live and Become"

The Rocket

יום העצמאות

"כל שיחת חוץ מקפיצה אותנו. הדאגה לו, לאחיו...מה עלי לאמר לסרן שלי שרובץ בחולות הנגב כבר שבועות ושן כשעתיים ביממה...בר מצווה היה כשהבאנו אותו לכאן לגולת כבר אז הודיע לי שהוא חוזר איש לא יכריח אותו להישאר..."

CJC distributes green ribbons

"I salute those who have produced these green ribbons for us to wear," said Layton, referring to ribbons provided by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) for MPs and provincial legislators to show support for the people of Sudan's Darfur region, where hundreds of thousands of people have been killed or displaced, and where an Arab militia, the Janjaweed, has attacked ethnic black Africans, raped women and pillaged villages. The group is accused of widespread atrocities, with government support.

CJC distributed the ribbons to members of the House of Commons, Quebec's National Assembly and the legislatures of British Columbia and Ontario to wear on Yom Hashoah to draw a connection between the Holocaust and the current Darfur crisis.

The keynote address was given by Supreme Court Justice Rosalie Abella, who told the story of her own parents, Holocaust survivors who rebuilt their lives in this country.

"Canada is where they started all over again," Abella said. "None of [the survivors] will ever forget how lucky they were to be able to come to Canada, but neither will they forget why they came. Neither should we."

As their names were called by master of ceremonies Herb Gray, a former deputy prime minister and longtime MP, Holocaust survivors or their representatives were accompanied by representatives of the Canadian government as they laid wreaths at the Eternal Flame.

Hundreds of people, including many who had come from Montreal and Toronto for the ceremony, braved cold temperatures to honour the memories of those who died in the Shoah.

Cantor David Aptowitzer sang Zog Nit Keinmol, which was followed by the blowing of the shofar by Rabbi Charles Popky and Rabbi Arnold Fine. Cantor Pinchas Levinson led the singing of Hatikvah.

The event was sponsored by Beit Halochem Canada, the Asper Foundation, B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), Canadian Jewish Congress, the Israeli Embassy, Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, Temple Sinai Congregation, the Wierzbniker Society and Zaglembier Society of Toronto, with the support of the Canadian government and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

3 generations mark Yom Hashoah

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — As Quebec Lt.-Gov. Lise Thibault looked on, Holocaust survivors and their children and grandchildren rose from their seats and silently pledged to forever remember the six million Jews who were murdered in the Holocaust and "the depths to which humanity can sink."

That promise was delivered by Selena Sporn Garellek, a member of the "second generation," and by survivor Ann Zoltak and Adam Barza, a member of the "third generation," as more than 2,000 people filled the Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Congregation on a rainy evening, for the annual community-wide Holocaust Memorial Day commemoration.

Thibault was clearly moved by the hour-long ceremony, telling Shoah survivors in the crowd that nobody in the future "should have to live the suffering you live every day of your life."

She and others underscored the vital importance of transmitting the lessons of the Holocaust from one generation to the next and of recognizing the ultimate "immortality" of the victims whose memories will be cherished forever.

As in the past, students in the hallways read aloud names of victims as people entered the sanctuary and lit yahrzeit candles. The event was also attended once again by a large number of politicians, community leaders and dignitaries, ranging from the German and Russian consuls-general Hartmut Scheer and Igor Golubyovsky, to municipal opposition leader Pierre Bourque, Public Works Minister Michael Fortier and MP Irwin Cotler.

But unlike in previous ceremonies, a new emphasis – 61 years after the end of the war – was placed this year on passing the torch of memory within families. Using the theme of "Generations Remember," three generations of six survivor families lit the Holocaust memorial candles.

Yom Hashoah committee co-chair and survivor Sidney Zoltak called it a duty for the generations to "remember and remind."

Co-chair Sara Weinberg, who as a child resisted asking her survivor parents about the Holocaust for fear of causing them pain, said she eventually came to realize the cathartic and therapeutic value in survivors recounting what they experienced to their families.

Also for the first time, brief personal testimonies of survivors were shown on screens during the candlelightings – three in English, one in French, one in Yiddish and one in Italian.

Audience members gasped at the horrors they heard as Enzo Camerino described how 72 members of his family were murdered, and Ann Kazimirski, choking back tears on screen, said her husband was the only survivor from thousands of Jews in his town.

Israel's consul general in Montreal, Marc Attali, described Israel and the Zionist movement as the ultimate victors over the Nazis' quest to annihilate the Jewish people.

The evening, organized by the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, also included readings about the Shoah; a "recitation of names" by FEDERATION CJA's Danyael Cantor and Rosa Finestone of the David Weismann Institute; musical interludes by the Jewish People's Schools and Peretz Schools Choir and the Shaar Hashomayim Singers and Synagogue Choir; and recitations of K'El Maleh Rachamim, psalms and Kaddish.

Yom Hashoah was also commemorated at Jewish day schools, at the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors and at Montreal City Hall, where B'nai Brith arranged to have students read the names of child Holocaust victims from its steps.

A third "Seder Shoah" was also planned for last Sunday at Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom, organized by Child Survivors/Hidden Children of the Holocaust and by Montreal Second Generation.

Coast to Coast

Atlantic communities hold solemn ceremonies

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Candles flickered in the background as Sally Wasserman urged her listeners to "protect the rights of others. If not, our rights could vanish."

The Toronto woman, a hidden child of the Holocaust, was speaking to a full house at a Yom Hashoah ceremony at Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Halifax.

Short but feisty, Wasserman's clear voice resonated throughout the hall as she asked people to remember the heroes and the righteous.

"Remember the courage, strength and resilience of the survivors, who went to strange lands with broken spirit and bodies, facing a new language, and became successful," she urged.

"Survivors can be proud of their achievements," she continued. "They came out of hell to create a homeland, to become respected citizens in their adopted countries."

Wasserman also praised the courageous men and women in Europe who took Jews into their homes in the face of threat of death.

"I was lucky to experience humanity in the midst of inhumanity [in Dadrowa, Poland, from where her entire family was sent to the death camps].

Wasserman also spoke in Sydney, N.S., under the auspices of the Atlantic Jewish Council's Holocaust education program, which is funded through a grant from the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany

In Sydney, Wasserman decried how 1.5 million of the six million Jews killed during the Holocaust were children.

"Young children were the first to be murdered because they could not contribute to the German economy. One-and-a-half million innocent children," she said, her voice breaking.

"Their only crime? They were Jews. I was one of the lucky children to have survived."

Izzy Unger, a Fredericton resident and Holocaust survivor, spoke in his hometown, and Saint John, N.B., survivor Philip Riteman of Halifax addressed a Charlottetown, P.E.I., audience.

Sylvia Thomas read and discussed poetry by her father, Irving Fogwill, editor of the Labour Herald, at an event in St. John's, Nfld.

Susan Sandager, director of community relations for Bridges of Peace USA, a Christian group that supports Israel, was brought to the region by the AJC to present a one-woman dramatic re-creation of the life of a Dutch Christian woman, Corrie ten Boom, who hid Jews in her family's home.

Sandager appeared before three Halifax church groups, and one each in Charlottetown and Antigonish, N.S., plus the Holocaust memorial event in Moncton, N.B.

The Albuquerque, N.M. resident – a 50-year-old Christian who has been a member of, worked with, and been honoured by Hadassah – portrayed ten Boom as an 80-year-old woman recounting her efforts in Haarlem in Holland.

Sandager dressed in ten Boom's garb and spoke with a Dutch accent in a performance she has given hundreds of times, including at the Jerusalem Convention Centre.

At the conclusion of the narrative, Sandager, as ten Boom, said, "Much has changed in the 61 years [since the Holocaust]. But one thing hasn't. We must still be vigilant against anti-Semitism. Jews have been persecuted for more than 2,000 years, much of it in the name of Christ. You [addressing her Christian audiences] need to learn of our Christian heritage and [Christians'] persecution of Jews."

Later, Sandager said there was another group to be remembered in addition to the Holocaust's murderers, victims and bystanders.

"That group is those who had the courage to do what Corrie ten Boom, he: father and sister did in hiding up to 800 Jews during a three-year period. Yes, they were in danger, and finally taken away by the Germans [her father and sister died in captivity, and Corrie was freed], but we can't stand by, even today, and watch hate exist.

"As Christians we have a biblical mandate to help the Jews. We have to stand up against those who speak against Israel."

At each Yom Hashoah ceremony, candles to commemorate the six million Jews who were killed were lit by community representatives, both Jewish and non-Jewish.

Non-Jews made up much of the audiences at several sites. At a noon-hour event in downtown Halifax, names of victims were read aloud. Similar readings of names were held at each community event.

ETERNAL FLAMES: Grade 2 students at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School observed Yom Hashoah last week by reading thematic stories, taking part in a candlelighting service and learning how each of them is a blessing that honours the memory of those who died. After the great flood, God promised Noah that He would never destroy the Earth again through water, and gave Noah a sign (see Genesis 8:12 -17). Jewish tradition teaches us that during the life of Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai, this sign never appeared, because during his lifetime, no sign or promise was needed. It is said that Rabbi Shimon was so great that he shielded the world from punishment. To find out what this sign is, just do the colour by number.

Shimon Bar Yochai

"Elazar, wake up. Elazar!" Elazar stirred, and opened his eyes. In the dim candlelight, he could make out the troubled expression on the face of his father, Rabbi Shimon.

"What's wrong, Father?"

"The Romans are after me. I spoke out against the Roman government and there is a warrant out for my arrest - and execution."

Elazar breathed in sharply. "So what are you going to do?"

"I am going into hiding. Immediately. I just wanted to say goodbye before I leave."

Elazar sat up in bed. "I'm coming with you."

Elazar stood up.

"I need you, Father. Who else will teach me to be a man? Let's not waste any precious time arguing. We have to go now."

The two of them vanished into the night.

* * * * *

"This cave looks as if it will work short term. It's definitely far enough from the main roads to keep us out of danger. But there's no food here, and I can't find a water source either. Tomorrow, we'll have to keep looking for somewhere to hide."

Rabbi Shimon sighed. "I hope we'll find a place."

"I'm going to look around some more," declared Elazar.

"May God help you. Elazar, I already checked over there. Try looking on the other side of the cave."

"Father, are you sure you checked here already? There's a tree here, and there's some type of fruit on the branches. They're carobs! We can live on those."

"And look!" continued Elazar. "The ground here is muddy. If we follow the trail there, under the boulder!"

He pushed the rock aside. "There's a spring of water!" he shouted triumphantly.

Rabbi Shimon gazed at the bubbling spring. "I looked here before. There was no tree. There was no water. It's a miracle. God truly is watching over us."

Rabbi Shimon and Elazar hid in the cave for many years, studying Torah and the Kabbalah. Finally, 12 long years later, a radiant figure appeared in the entrance to the cave.

"Who will tell the son of Yochai that the Caesar has died?" he asked, as if speaking to himself. "Who will tell him that the death order is no longer in effect?" Then he vanished.

"That must have been Elijah the Prophet," exclaimed Rabbi Shimon. "Finally, we can go home."

Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai lived in Israel about 2,000 years ago. He was the author of the great Kabbalistic work known as the Zohar. He passed away on Lag b'Omer, the 18th day of the Hebrew month of Iyar, which usually occurs in May. He was buried in the village of Meiron. In Israel, Lag b'Omer has become a day of rejoicing, celebrating the culmination of his illustrious life. Tens of thousands of people flock to Meiron on Lag b'Omer to celebrate and pray around bonfires lit in honour of Rabbi Shimon.

In North America many people celebrate Lag b'Omer with hikes, picnics, and barbecues, and sometimes a kumzitz — an evening of song around a bonfire. Archery is also a traditional Lag b'Omer pastime.

U.S. pushes for UN action on Iran

By NATHAN GUTTMAN
Jerusalem Post

NEW YORK — The United Nations Security Council was to convene this week to begin discussions on a new resolution on Iran's nuclear program, with the possibility of imposing future sanctions if President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's administration does not comply with the demand to stop the program.

The United States and Britain are behind the move to get the Security Council more actively involved in the issue, following Friday's submission of a report by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) that concluded that Iran did not meet the requirements regarding halting its nuclear program and did not co-operate with the inspection teams of the agency.

U.S. President George W. Bush said, following the submission of the report, that the world is united in concern over Iran's nuclear ambitions, yet he stressed the diplomatic channel as the way to deal with this concern. "I think the diplomatic options are just beginning," Bush said.

The United States has already begun work on a draft resolution that was to presented this week to the Security Council. The resolution calls on the international body to demand that Iran live up to its obligations as a member of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

U.S. ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton said the resolution will be under Chapter 7 of the UN charter, which paves the way to imposing sanctions against Iran if it does not comply. As a last resort, Chapter 7 also allows the use of military measures as a way to enforce the UN decisions.

"That really puts the ball back in Iran's court, and it's up to them whether they will honour their obligations," Bolton said.

The United States still faces an uphill battle to force Iran to accept the demands of the international community. Out of the five permanent members of the Security Council that hold a veto power, only three – the United States, Britain and France – agree on a Chapter 7 resolution. The other two – China and Russia – prefer moving forward without a binding resolution and are expected to oppose such a resolution when brought to the Security Council. Foreign ministers of the five permanent members and of Germany will meet in New York on May 9 to discuss the issue.

Yevgeny Primakov, former Russian prime minister and foreign minister, said last weekend that he believed a deal on Iranian uranium enrichment on Russian soil might still be salvageable, despite Tehran's refusal to accept it until now.

The IAEA report determines that Iran did not act on the UN Security Council resolution calling for a halt of its nuclear activity within a 30-day time period. Tehran, according to the report, did not co-operate with the IAEA team and refused to provide information regarding the uranium enrichment plans and the use of a centrifuge cascade to enable the enrichment process.

"After more than three years of agency efforts to seek clarity about all aspects of Iran's nuclear program, the existing gaps in knowledge continue to be a matter of concern," the report said. It also stressed that Iran did not provide the full transparency that the international community demanded. The report could not determine whether Iran is still actively enriching uranium.

The 30-day period given by the Security Council to Iran was part of a non-binding resolution. Now that the IAEA inspectors have determined that Iran did nothing during this grace period to comply with the requirements, it is easier for the international community to pursue other ways to coerce Iran into co-operation, including the use of sanctions.

Even after the release of the IAEA report, Iran remained defiant and declared it would co-operate only if its nuclear program would be dealt with by the IAEA exclusively, without involving the Security Council. In a letter to the agency, Iran said that if this condition was met, it would be willing to provide a timetable within three weeks for resuming the talks with the IAEA.

Last weekend Iran seemed to be on course of deepening the conflict with the international community, with a series of confrontational statements.

Ahmadinejad said that the UN cannot make Iran give up their nuclear program and added that "the Iranian nation won't give a damn about such useless resolutions."

Foiled attack was funded by Hamas, Shin Bet says

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Senior Hamas leaders in Gaza funded and trained Palestinian terrorists who last week launched a thwarted terror strike on the Karni Crossing into the Gaza Strip, the Shin Bet (Israel Security Agency) revealed on Sunday.

This was the first time since winning the Palestinian elections in January that Hamas was directly connected to anti-Israel terror activity.

A cell consisting of operatives from the Popular Resistance Committee (PRC) arrived at the Palestinian side of Karni last Wednesday in three cars, one filled with explosives, the Shin Bet said. The plan was to blow a hole in a wall dividing the PA side of the terminal from the Israeli side, which the gunmen would then use to infiltrate the crossing. But the attack was thwarted by PA police who stopped the cars at a roadblock leading into the crossing.

Security officials said that while Hamas has been putting on appearances that it had ceased its terror activity, in reality the group was funding and training PRC cells, which regularly fired Qassam rockets at Israeli targets from northern Gaza. The head of PRC in Gaza, Mumtaz Dugmash, officials said, regularly participated in Hamas meetings during which terror attacks were planned. Hamas, the officials said, not only funded PRC activities but also supplied the group with weaponry and additional professional assistance.

"At no point since agreeing to a hudna [ceasefire] with Israel in 2005, has Hamas ceased its terror activity," a Shin Bet official said Sunday. "They provide money and training to PRC operatives who perpetrate the attacks like the attempt on Karni last week."

The Shin Bet said it received intelligence implicating four senior Hamas officials in the attempted attack on Karni last week, including Ahmed Andor, head of Hamas in northern Gaza and Ahmed Jabri, head of the Hamas military wing in Gaza. The same Hamas officials, the Shin Bet said, also directed and gave logistical support to a PRC cell that assassinated Musa Arafat – the late PA president Yasser Arafat's nephew and a security advisor to current PA President Mahmoud Abbas – in September.

Israeli officials noted the irony that while Hamas was warning of a humanitarian disaster inside Gaza and while the Palestinian Authority was lobbying the world to pressure Israel to keep the Karni crossing open, Hamas was involved in an attack aimed at blowing it up. Due to numerous terror warnings, Karni has been repeatedly opened and closed by Israel since the Gaza pullout last year. The closures are often depicted by the PA as collective punishment on Palestinians, who rely on the goods transferred through the crossing.

"Hamas spokespeople who have continuously complained to the western media of a so-called Israeli policy to starve the Palestinian people are now exposed as cynical hypocrites whose real agenda is nihilism. They have no scruples about bringing suffering on their own people to advance their own extreme political agenda," an Israeli official said.

A senior official in the Prime Minister's Office said he was not surprised that Hamas' fingerprints were all over the attempted attack on Karni because Hamas has been using the Poplar Resistance Committees in Gaza as fronts for involvement in terror. "Hamas has never ceased its involvement," the official said. "They just did not take credit."

Israeli officials have said continuously since Hamas won the Palestinian Legislative elections in January that Israel would continue to target Hamas officials if they were found to be involved in terrorist activities.

In related matters, asked to sum up the achievements of his cabinet one month after entering office, embattled Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said he was confident the Hamas cabinet would complete its four-year term in office.

"We're always optimistic," Haniyeh said. "Our optimism stems from our belief and determination that we must continue the process until the liberation of our lands."

Ismail Haniyeh

But his optimism doesn't seem to be shared by a growing number of Palestinians, who believe they are now closer than ever to civil war and bankruptcy.

Boycotted by the international community, Haniyeh's cabinet is still trying to raise funds to pay salaries to some 140,000 PA civil servants. They haven't been paid for March and many say they can't even afford to travel to work.

Hamas has thus far failed to raise enough funds in the Arab and Islamic world. Its leaders have been promised tens of millions of dollars by Iran, Libya and a few Arab countries, but the money has still not been transferred to Ramallah and Gaza. A drive by Hamas to collect donations from Arabs and Muslims has also failed because of the failure of Arab banks to co-operate.

Even if the promised money does arrive, Hamas officials note, it would hardly cover the amount required to pay March's salaries.

In addition to the financial crisis, the Hamas cabinet is also facing a political and diplomatic boycott by most of the world. Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar, who has just wrapped up a tour of a number of Arab countries, including Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Libya, is returning with promises and little cash.

But challenges facing the cabinet at home appear to be worse. Some ministers living in the West Bank are forced to use public transportation to get to work in Ramallah. Unlike their Fatah predecessors, the Hamas ministers are not equipped with Israeli-issued VIP passes enabling them to drive through Israeli checkpoints without delay.

One minister was forced last week to walk through wadis and hills to avoid Israel Defence Forces checkpoints. His journey from Nablus to Ramallah lasted more than seven hours.

In the month it's been in power, the Hamas cabinet has not been able to meet in its entirety around one table. More than half its ministers live in the West Bank, while the rest, including Haniyeh, live in Gaza. Many Palestinians jokingly refer to the cabinet as the "video-conference government," as that is how it conducts its weekly meetings.

Hamas officials are openly accusing PA Chairman Mahmoud Abbas and his senior aides of conspiring with the US and Israel to bring down the Hamas cabinet. The allegations have resulted in increased tensions between Hamas and Abbas' Fatah, with both sides spreading rumours about the other.

While Fatah leaders have accused Hamas of hypocrisy and incompetence, Hamas spokesmen say they are the victims of a US-led conspiracy to oust their democratically elected government.

Meanwhile, Hamas' decision to establish its own security force in Gaza has worried Abbas. Although Abbas has vetoed the decision by Interior Minister Said Siam, the force, consisting mostly of Hamas militiamen, has already begun operating as another police force. Its members are believed to have shot and seriously wounded a PA police officer who dared to block Haniyeh's motorcade in Gaza this month.

Some Arab and Muslim countries, which have been acting as mediators between Hamas and Fatah, are exerting heavy pressure on both sides to establish a national unity cabinet. Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Qatar are said to have persuaded the two sides to seriously consider this possibility. Fatah and Hamas leaders are scheduled to meet in Gaza in mid-May for crisis talks aimed at forming a joint government. Until then, the two parties are likely to continue hanging their dirty laundry in public through street leaflets and websites.

Israel Briefs

We will block Iran: Olmert

Israel will never allow Iran to acquire the power to wipe out the Jewish state, Ehud Olmert said. "When we hear a dictator say that he is prepared to wipe out the Jewish people, we don't take it lightly," the Israeli prime minister said in a videolink address to the Anti-Defamation League's leadership conference in Washington. "We are capable, and I promise we'll do everything in our power to make sure that no one, including those who are saying it these days, will ever have the power to carry out these statements." The UN nuclear watchdog says Iran probably has a nuclear weapons program, despite its denials.

Bomb victim out of coma

An American student critically injured in the April 17 Tel Aviv bombing emerged from a coma after nine days. A spokesperson for Ichilov Hospital in Tel Aviv said Daniel Wultz is likely to recover. Associated Press reported. Though Wultz isn't yet able to speak, the hospital said he is conscious and can communicate with his eyes. Wultz, 16, a student at David Posnack Hebrew Day School in Weston, Fla., was in Israel visiting relatives for Passover.

Israelis undeterred in Sinai

Hundreds of Israeli tourists remained in the Sinai despite last week's terror attacks there. According to Foreign Ministry figures, just a few dozen of some 1,700 Israelis vacationing at Red Sea resorts returned home after last Monday's triple bombing in Dahab, which killed 24 people and was followed by two explosions Wednesday that caused no deaths. An estimated 17,000 Israelis visited Sinai over the recent Passover holiday. Three Israelis were wounded in the Dahab bombings.

Holocaust day attack foiled

Israeli security forces foiled a Palestinian terrorist attack planned for Holocaust Remembrance Day. Troops captured three would-be suicide bombers near the West Bank city of Nablus as they tried to circumvent military checkpoints. The detainees, from Fatah, said under interrogation that they were headed to an attack on Israel.

Zarqawi threatens Israel

The leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq threatened a holy war on Israel. Appearing unmasked for the first time in a video statement released this week, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi decried a supposed "Zionist and Crusader" plot against the Muslim world. "Holy Jerusalem will be liberated only through jihad," he said. "To the U.S. administration, to Bush the commander of the Crusader assault, to his Jewish personnel, to the Crusaders and to the traitorous Muslims, we say: They will not enjoy one moment of quiet as long as there is blood in our veins."

Spy satellite launched

Israel launched a new satellite that will heighten its ability to monitor Iran. The Eros-B was launched last week from a Russian missile base in Siberia and was expected to be in working orbit by last weekend. It's designed to give the Israeli military an extra eye on the Middle East, especially arch-foe Iran. The Eros-B offers an all-weather camera with enhanced resolution that can pick up items on the ground as small as two feet in diameter. Israeli efforts to monitor Iran suffered a setback last year when a rocket taking the Ofek-6 spy satellite into orbit crashed on takeoff.

Shoah survivors in poverty

More than 25 per cent of Holocaust survivors in Israel live below the poverty line, a lobby group says. According to figures released last week by the Holocaust Survivors' Welfare Fund, some 80,000 of 280,000 survivors get by on a few hundred dollars a month, with limited access to health care. Israel's Finance Ministry said it allocates $330 million (US) for survivors, who generally get more in state benefits than other senior citizens. Part of the problem is that many survivors are recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union and don't get reparation payments from abroad like their counterparts from western Europe.

Spiegel, head of German Jewish council, dies

JTA

Paul Spiegel

BERLIN — The leader of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, Paul Spiegel, died Sunday.

Spiegel, who was 68, had been hospitalized in Dusseldorf with cancer. As chair of the council since January 2000, Spiegel represented one of Europe's largest Jewish populations, numbering more than 100,000 members.

Born in Warendorf, Germany, in 1937, Spiegel was hidden from the Nazis by Belgian Catholic farmers. In 1945, he returned to his home in Germany and said he decided to stay because of the actions of some of his neighbours, who had helped a local synagogue by concealing texts from the Nazis.

Spiegel signed an agreement with then-chancellor Gerhard Schroeder in 2003 that gave the Jewish community equal legal standing with the country's main churches and annual government support of three million euros, or $3.8 million (US).

In a statement, German Chancellor Angela Merkel remembered Spiegel as "an impressive personality who campaigned with great passion and all his energy for a good future for the Jewish community in Germany."

Proud of Canadian grocery stores

By LISA WEINBERG

Patients frequently come to see me after returning from a trip to the United States where they visited a grocery store and returned home raving about new groceries they bought that are low fat, low cal, low carb, etc. This often makes many of us proud Canadians feel that our grocery selection is substandard and maybe even less healthy than that of our neighbors to the south.

Well, I have to admit that I have not necessarily had the same experience. While I do vacation in some different parts of the United States each year, I have been a loyal shopper at one large, healthy grocery store chain there.

But on a vacation in Florida this winter with my husband and our children, age five and seven, I did go to a regular grocery store to pick up a few things to keep in the hotel, and I was shocked.

First, the produce section in this large store was a quarter the size of the one in any grocery store I shop at in Toronto – and this in a state where they grow fresh produce all year long.

Next, I visited the cookie and cracker aisle, where I was looking to buy one package of each. I was searching for cookies and crackers that met my regular criteria when shopping at home – no trans fat, a limited amount of saturated fat, and preferable no MSG or colouring. I found only one type of cracker that fit this criteria and no cookies.

Every cracker or cookie I picked up contained trans fat, and many also had high fructose corn syrup, another artery clogging ingredient found much less frequently in Canada (although always in pop). I even spotted high fructose corn syrup on the mini-packets of jam in restaurants.

I did, however, find one item that we do not usually have in Canada, although I wish we did, and that is organic, lactose-free milk, which I buy for my husband who is lactose intolerant. This, in my opinion, is long overdue on our shelves in an organic version.

Overall, though, if you are under the impression that our food selection is inferior to that in the United States, I disagree. I think our groceries –while many still contain a myriad of ingredients and chemicals that I am opposed to – are generally far cleaner and healthier than those in the United States.

And while I did go back to shop in my healthy grocery store for the remainder of the trip and happily chose from among a great selection of healthy, delicious foods, and I enjoyed the warm weather and scenery, I returned home more proud than ever to be Canadian.

Diverse themes animate Toronto Jewish Film Festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Members of a Vietnamese refugee family struggle to accustom themselves to Israel. An iconic Israeli personality is profiled. A woman in Israel finds her long lost father in Siberia. A death camp in Poland is excavated. A Jewish lawyer defends a vicious neo-Nazi skinhead.

These are the themes of five of the movies scheduled to be screened at the 14th annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which runs from May 6 to 14. For tickets and info call 416-324-9121 or visit www. tiff.com

In 1979, Israel's prime minister, Menachem Begin, a survivor of Soviet gulags who had lost part of his family in the Holocaust, admitted a small number of Vietnamese boat people to the Jewish state. It was a humane gesture designed to win public relations points for Israel in the world arena and to reaffirm Israel's sensitivity to the suffering of the less fortunate.

In The Journey of Vaan Nguyen, (May 9, noon, Al Green Theatre) by Duki Dror, the focus is on a Vietnamese family in Jaffa that still grapples with the feelings of displacement and a lack of acceptance.

Hoiami Nguyen, a gaunt restaurant worker, and his comely twentysomething daughter, Vaan, embark on a sentimental journey to their homeland. Having decided to return to Vietnam, Hoiami wants to reclaim ancestral land.

Though fairly poor, the Nguyens are much better off than they probably would have been in Vietnam. Yet they feel the pull of the motherland.

Hoiami and his wife speak barely passable Hebrew, but their daughters are fairly integrated. They speak fluent, idiomatic Hebrew, just like any Sabra, and one of them, Viet, has been inducted into the Israeli army.

When Vaan and her dad go back to the old country and explain that they have come from "the land of the Jews," they discover that their land has been purchased by a farmer, who has no intention of giving it up. Meanwhile, Vaan realizes that she feels more at home in Israel than in Vietnam.

The Journey of Vaan Nguyen, which turns on dislocation and the promise of hope, is a fine film.

Abe Nathan: As the Sun Sets (May 9, 1 p.m., Bloor Cinema) profiles one of Israel's best known peaceniks.

Born in Iran and raised in Bombay, India, Nathan was a pilot in the Israeli Air Force during the War of Independence. Then, as the proprietor of the California restaurant in Tel Aviv, he was a high-profile playboy.

When the war in Biafra raged, he dispatched food aid to its starving population. On Feb. 28, 1966, he made headlines by flying a plane to Port Said, Egypt, on a peace mission. Returning to Israel without having been granted a meeting with Egypt's president, Gamal Abdel Nasser, Nathan was summarily arrested and promptly released.

On May 19, 1973, less than four months before the outbreak of the Yom Kippur War, he founded the Voice of Peace radio station, which broadcast from a dilapidated ship off Israel's coast and was immortalized in John Lennon's song Give Peace A Chance. Its last broadcast was on Oct. 10, 1993, when the Oslo peace process was in full flight.

Abe Nathan, ably directed by Eytan Harris, focuses on these milestones in his career, but also presents the man as he appears today.

Having succumbed to a stroke in 1996, Nathan is but a pale shadow of himself, barely able to utter a word or show flashes of emotion. In the opening scenes, when he is filmed in a wheelchair on his way to a seniors' home, he is uncharacteristically quiet and remote. Only when he visits India does a smile crease his face.

As the film unreels, Nathan receives his daughter, Sharona, whom he has not seen in about a year. The long absence makes him cry, but Sharona says that he was not much of an affectionate father. Nor did Nathan keep in touch with his parents after he became a celebrity.

Melting Siberia, (May 9, 7 p.m., Bloor Cinema) by Ido Haar, is a tearjerker set in Tel Aviv and Novosibirsk, a city deep in Russia's Siberian wilderness, or, as Haar puts it, "at the end of the world."

Haar, having decided to contact his grandfather Tuvia Berkovich in Novosibirsk, tracks down his telephone number. A Red Army veteran who was briefly married to Haar's grandmother, Riva, Berkovich abandoned her when she was pregnant and broke off all contact with her and her daughter, Marina, Haar's mother, some 30 years ago.

Buoyed by the prospect of connecting with the father she has never laid eyes on, Marina phones her half-sister, Ludmilla, and learns that Berkovich and his second wife, Maria, are alive and well. She converses with Berkovich and the conversation is emotional.

Marina, though still incensed by her father's decision to leave her mother high and dry and remarry, starts a correspondence with Ludmilla. This leads to Marina's decision to visit Novosibirsk, a trip sanctioned by Riva. Marina's encounter with Berkovich and his family is a sight to behold.

Belzec, (May 10, 5 p.m., Bloor Cinema) directed by Guillaume Moscovitz, recounts the horrific story of a Nazi death camp in Poland. Although Belzec was in operation for less than a year, in 1942, it consumed the lives of 600,000 people, mostly Jews.

Belzec was razed by the Nazis to cover up their crimes, but evidence concerning its pivotal role in Hitler's plot to exterminate European Jewry continues to turn up. Polish archeologists have excavated the site and found 31 mass graves. Efforts are now underway to build a memorial to the victims.

The film derives its power from testimonies delivered by both Jews and Poles. "No one came out alive," says an old Polish man, recalling the columns of smoke and the stench from the camp. In fact, a handful of Jews escaped from Belzec. One Jewish survivor, who subsequently lived in Toronto, is quoted as saying that brutal Ukrainian guards forced women and children at bayonet-point into the gas chambers. There was terrible screaming for 15 minutes, then deafening silence. Belzec does not leave a viewer unmoved.

In David Gow's Steel Toes, (may 10, 9:30 p.m., Bloor Cinema) a Canadian production, a liberal Jewish legal aid lawyer, David Dunkelman (David Strathairn), is called upon to defend Michael Downey (Andrew Walker), a hateful, spiteful neo-Nazi skinhead accused of murdering an Indian immigrant. Downey grates on Dunkelman's nerves and sensibilities, but he agrees to act as his counsel. The performances are first-rate, but the film, its intense subject matter notwithstanding, generally fails to engage a viewer.

DOCUMENTARY FILM BY TORONTONIAN WINS UNITED NATIONS AWARD

The Making of a Martyr, a film by ex-Torontonian Brooke Goldstein that focuses on the tragic phenomenon of Palestinian children suicide bombers, won the Best Film Audience Choice Award at the United Nations Documentary Film Festival in April.

"It was an honour to participate in the second annual UN Film Festival, and to be in the company of other socially relevant and important films," said Goldstein, a former Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto student and now a human rights lawyer when she isn't making films.

"The fact that the audience bestowed an award upon our film shows that they are equally troubled by this phenomenon. I hope that public awareness of this tragedy continues to spread and that the film will inspire fruitful public debate and pressure on political authorities to help bring about the cessation of the ongoing and openly practised incitement and recruitment of innocent Palestinian children to kill themselves as human bombs."

Show about a troubled marriage dripping with comedy

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

A broken relationship has never been so fun to watch.

In Care, running at the Tarragon Theatre until May 28, a Jewish marriage faces all the hurdles that look easy to jump but are much harder to get past. Along the way, humour salts the fear and loneliness of trying to live another heavy day in wedlock.

Ellie (Diane Flacks) is crippled with the kind of tension familiar to new mothers: she's paranoid her one-year-old son isn't sleeping well; she doesn't feel sexy enough to make love to her husband; and she feels alone as a stay-at-home mom. To add to her anxiety, her cancer-stricken father has just asked her to kill him.

A different kind of pain afflicts Steve (Richard Greenblatt). His super-charged libido frustrates his indifferent wife, and a female client at work introduces to him the idea of an affair. He spends more time away from his newborn than he would prefer, which envelops him in a fog of guilt.

Richard Greenblatt and Diane Flacks star in Care, a play about a Jewish marriage that "faces all the hurdles that look easy to jump but are much harder to get past."

The common thread weaving through the play is a single question: how do you love someone when your priorities pull you elsewhere? Ellie tells Steve she needs to care for her son and father first. And Steve admits his big contract at work supersedes his parenting duties. The couple endures the frustration of miscommunication and awkward conversation, while still hoping they can overcome every obstacle thrown in their path.

Written by Flacks and Greenblatt, the play has the tone of experience, as if the two performers had actually faced this problem together. In fact, they worked together in the Tarragon show Sibs, so they're familiar with each other and convey that chemistry on the stage. The dialogue crackles with intensity during arguments, but softens delicately when intimate moments slip between conflicts. Flacks and Greenblatt are also adept physical actors, even blending interpretive dance into a trippy dream sequence.

Surprisingly, Care is peppered with humour you wouldn't expect from a drama fraught with tension. The two actors play other roles – some better than others – that spice the play with much-needed laughs. As Ellie's father, Greenblatt becomes a cantankerous old man who is so pessimistic he wants to pass on his tallit and yarmulke to his grandson, even though he's still alive. He pines for bagels with cream cheese and lox as if this final meal would satisfy him before death.

Flacks also dives into other skins quite adeptly, playing a lesbian personal trainer, a teenage volunteer, a blabbering yente, a seducing temptress, a compassionate nurse and God. As comedic breaks, these characters work wonders. But they also draw attention away from the conflict between Ellie and Steve, which makes the play feel more watered down than it should.

Packed into Care, though, are enough Jewish references to last Tarragon a year. The most engrossing discussion centres on how the couple plans to raise their child – with a bar mitzvah or without? Believing in God or believing in nothing? It's a familiar discussion to anyone who's argued their beliefs against another, and some lines will ring eerily true. Flacks is especially convincing during this scene, making certain to look exasperated at every contrary statement her husband utters.

The play's direction, under the eye of Eda Holmes, moves the actors around the stage enough to keep the audience guessing. Inventive uses of a simple bed prop and a projection screen allow scenes to flow into each other seamlessly. The music could have been more Jewish.

Care's main themes are not fodder for humour, but somehow the play is dripping with the kind of comedy that can only be described as Woody Allen meets John Irving. The characters are fleshed out so humanely it's hard not to care about them. If only to see how our lives mirror the daily routines of Ellie and Steve, Care is worth the price of admission.

Care runs until May 28 at the Tarragon Theatre, 30 Bridgeman Ave. Tickets range from $15 to $28, with a pay-what-you-can show on Sunday. For tickets, call 416-531-1827.

Festival features Jewish films from around the world

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

This year's edition of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which runs from May 6 to 14, yet again offers viewers an eclectic selection of documentaries and feature films.

The films reviewed here range from a glimpse of the ever-changing kibbutz to an examination of the deportation of Dutch Jews during the Holocaust. For tickets and info call 416-324-9121 or visit www.tiff.com

Doug Block's documentary, 51 Birch Street, (May 7, 9:30 p.m., Bloor Cinema) a retrospective look at his parents' 54-year marriage, unfolds in intriguing fashion. Mike and Minna Block were, as their son intones, "an inseparable unit." But three months after Minna's sudden death, Mike re-established contact with Kitty, his former secretary, and married her in Florida. This prompted Block and his sisters to ask themselves painful questions about the nature of his parents' relationship.

For the filmmaker, the quest to shed light on that sensitive issue was a difficult one, since he and his father, a rather emotionally remote man, had never been close. But because he and his siblings considered their father's second marriage indecently hasty, and thus insulting to the memory of their beloved mother, he proceeded with his investigation.

"We just sort of blend," Kitty coos. "It's sex," he says wolfishly. Disturbed by these disclosures, Block remembers that Kitty was a guest at his bar mitzvah in 1966, and he wonders whether she and his father were in fact lovers.

Delving deeper into the evolving mystery, Block watches a video in which Minna admits that she was unhappy in her marriage. Going one step further, he reads Minna's revealing and heretofore secret diaries, replete with revelations about an affair she had with her therapist. Finally, he discusses the matter with his father, who clinically describes his marriage with Minna as "a functioning association."

By turns bland and explosive, Block's unusual film is a bracing demonstration of the uncanny ability of some people to lead double lives.

Racheli Schwartz's Kibbutz (May 7, 1 p.m., Bloor Cinema, with The Children's House) is a portrait of what is probably Israel's most inimitable and enduring institution.

Like many kibbutzim, Hulata, founded in 1939, was privatized in the name of economic efficiency. But privatization has spiritually gutted Hulata and driven its inhabitants inward.

"What you had was very special," the kibbutz's financial advisor says with a touch of awe. He adds in a note of finality: "It's over."

Kibbutzniks now pay for all services and meals in what was the communal dining hall. "The spirit of the times has changed," a man observes sadly. As members have withdrawn into themselves, they have demanded privacy and their own little corner. "Now it's every man for himself," laments a kibbutznik who toils in the laundry room.

These sombre developments are juxtaposed against nostalgic file footage showing the happy faces of kibbutzniks working fields in the early 1960s and of pioneer members dancing merrily around a stockade.

"Once a kibbutz was a big family," a young man muses. "No more!" Today, kibbutzniks are money mad. "We have lost our future," another one adds.

Some can't adjust to the bitter realities. A man whose job in the citrus orchard was terminated commits suicide in a grand gesture of utter despair. Kibbutz charts these developments dispassionately.

Something Sweet, (May 8, 9:30 p.m., Bloor Cinema) an Israeli confection by Dan Turgeman, revolves around a love triangle between Tamar, a Moroccan Jewish pastry chef and caterer, her younger sister, Maya, and Alon, a high-tech entrepreneur based in London, England.

Maya, a sweet young thing, and her considerably older fiance, Alon, intend to get married in the summer. But all bets are off once they arrive in Israel to attend a wedding. After a flour fight in a bakery, Alon and Tamar find themselves immensely attracted to each other. Meanwhile, a young-and-upcoming writer falls for Maya.

The title of A Synagogue on Broome Street: The Greek Jews of the Lower East Side, (May 10, 6 p.m., Al Green Theatre, with Cuba: Beyond the Pearl of the Antilles) by Ed Askinazi, refers to the one and only Romaniot shul in the Western hemisphere.

Romaniot Jews settled in Greece in the pre-Christian era, were citizens of the Byzantine Empire and spoke Greek Judeo, a mixture of Greek, Hebrew and Turkish. Prior to World War I, these Hellenized Jews came to the United States, settling in the crowded tenements of Manhattan.

In the film, Askinazi and his father, Calvin, visit the Broome Street synagogue and chat with old friends and acquaintances to relive fond memories. The Romaniot Jews were close-knit, but drifted apart in the wake of World War II, their neighbourhood taken over by Chinese immigrants. As a result, the shul, which has not had a rabbi for 35 years, is in danger of closing.

Nevertheless, the Romaniots preserve their unique Diaspora culture and meet at regular reunions known as "pashas." This relatively brief documentary pays homage to them.

* * *

Willy Lindwer, in Goodbye Holland, (May 8, 1 p.m., Bloor Cinema) demolishes, once and for all, the cherished myth that the Dutch behaved honourably under Nazi occupation.

True, some Dutch people risked their lives to help Jews, including Lindwer's parents. But all too often, the Dutch were indifferent to their fate. Indeed, 80 per cent of Holland's 100,000 Jews were murdered by the Nazis, the highest rate in western Europe.

In this hard-hitting movie, Lindwer claims that anti-Semitism was deeply rooted in Holland and that the Dutch regarded Jews as a separate group.

"Dutch society was not really willing to save us," claims the Jewish mayor of a major town. "The system generated a catastrophe."

According to Lindwer, the Dutch bureaucracy was at the disposal of the German occupiers, and the Nazis acted accordingly.

* * *

Hitler Cantata, (May 7, 8:30 p.m., Al Green Theatre) a German picture written and directed by Jutta Bruckner and set in the late 1930s, pits an anti-Nazi composer against his pro-Nazi assistant, a woman of Aryan appearance who attempts to seduce him as he struggles to write a symphony for Hitler's 50th birthday. The film is fragmentary, formless and ultimately aimless.

Wartime novel unfinished because author died in Auschwitz

Suite Francaise* by Irene Nemirovsky, Knopf Canada (hardcover), High Bridge Audio (audio book).

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Irene Nemirovsky was the daughter of a wealthy Jewish banker who fled Russia in 1918 after the Revolution and immigrated with her family to France.

She established herself as a popular writer, and when she escaped from Paris to the countryside with her husband and two daughters in 1941 during the Nazi invasion, she immersed herself in writing what she planned would be a five-part novel about the lives of different families caught up in the chaos of wartime France.

She only wrote two parts of what would become Suite Francaise before she was arrested and deported to Auschwitz in 1942 where she quickly succumbed to typhus.

Her two daughters went into hiding and took the manuscript with them, treasuring it all these years. It was only published in France a couple of years ago where it became a bestseller, and is now available here in hardback and as an audio book.

The two parts are "Storm In June," which tells of the panic that struck French residents upon the German invasion, and "Dolce," a portrait of Nazi occupation in the sleepy, idyllic village of Bussy.

It is telling from Nemirovsky's notes that as she was writing, history in the making, she didn't know how it would finish.

The titles of the three unwritten parts are "Captivity;" "Battles?"; "Peace?" The question marks for the final two installments tell of her uncertainty of the book's, and her own, outcome.

"Storm in June" opens as the Germans approach Paris and shelling is heard in the distance. Nemirovsky's excellence at descriptive narrative shines from the outset:

"The sun came up, fiery red, in a cloudless sky. A shell was fired, now so close to Paris that from the top of every monument birds rose into the sky. Great black birds, rarely seen at other times, stretched out their pink-tinged wings. Beautiful fat pigeons cooed; swallows wheeled; sparrows hopped peacefully in the deserted streets."

The Péricands, a proud, upper-class family that includes Charlotte, her husband, a museum director, five children and an invalid grandfather, come to the stark realization that they have to abandon Paris and move to the countryside (not unlike the author herself). Packing what they can and taking a handful of their servants, they flee as the sound of German artillery echoes behind them.

Also escaping is Gabriel Corte, a rich and successful novelist who feels personally insulted by the war. His mistress packs a suitcase as tight as she can, preferring to save her makeup kit rather than Gabriel's manuscripts.

The Michauds, Maurice and Jeanne, are a young couple who work in a bank. They are told that all the staff are being evacuated to a countryside branch the next day. The bank manager promises the Michauds that he would drive them to the countryside himself.

When they show up the next day, suitcase in hands, they are told flatly that there is no room for them in his car, as he has to transport his mistress and her dog instead. Their boss, instead of apologizing, tells them they have to be in Tours the next day or they will be fired.

With the train station closed, the Michauds have no choice but to join hundreds of refugees on foot.

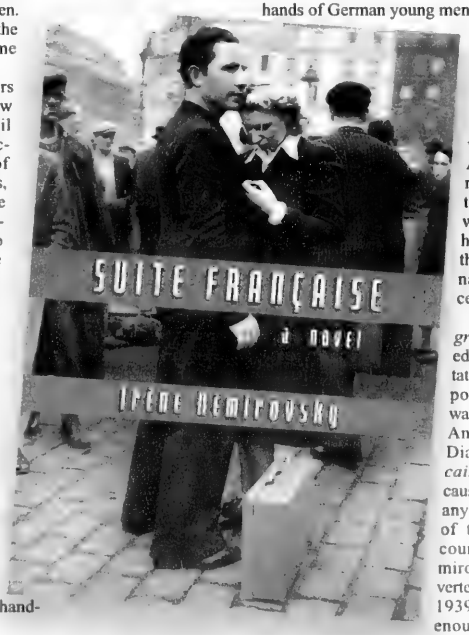
With these three families, Nemirovsky expertly intertwines the lives of members of different classes in society to represent the thousands of people who, like herself, found themselves in a great state of upheaval.

Another group of refugees is a truckload of young orphan boys being escorted by a priest, the oldest of the Péricands' children. His fate is brutally described in one of the book's most disturbing chapters.

Nemirovsky's narrative is simply beautiful and descriptive. Consider this paragraph written, remember, before France's wartime history had been written. Nemirovsky almost seemed to predict the myth of resistance that would become popular lore:

"He recalled the cars full of officers running away with their beautiful yellow trunks and their painted women, civil servants abandoning their posts, panic-stricken politicians dropping files of secret papers along the road, young girls, who had diligently wept the day the armistice was being signed, being comforted in the arms of Germans. 'And to think that no one will know, that there will be such a conspiracy of lies that all this will be transformed into yet another glorious page in the history of France.'"

"Dolce" begins after the armistice is signed. Instead of the powerful, hard-hitting narrative of the first part, we now find ourselves in a more tranquil setting. With the war lost, the French must now deal with their new situation in Nazi-occupied France. Again, dealing with different classes of people, it deals specifically with one German regiment in Bussy and the little town's inhabitants and deftly tackles the subject of collaboration when Lucile Angellier finds herself attracted to Bruno von Falk, a handsome German officer.



The German soldiers are not portrayed in the brutal fashion we are accustomed to, but rather as normal, kindly young men forced under the circumstances to wear military uniforms. Considering what happened to Nemirovsky at the hands of German young men in uniform, this is full of irony.

Considering this novel is not even half finished, it is a remarkable addition to wartime fiction. And had Nemirovsky survived the war, her name would undoubtedly have become one of the most recognized names in 20th century literature.

The Daily Telegraph said, "Regarded by some commentators as the most important descriptive wartime writing since Anne Frank's Diaries." Suite Francaise is not a Holocaust novel, and [redacted] any mention is made of the plight of the country's Jews. Nemirovsky herself converted to Catholicism in 1939, but this was not enough to save her in the end.

The book is just under 400 pages, and the audio version clocks in at just over 13 hours. The first part is read by Daniel Oreskes and the second by Barbara Rosenblat.

Film distribution mogul opens doors for young people

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

For one week this winter, some 1,600 students had the opportunity to see Paperclips, a documentary about tolerance, at free screenings throughout the Toronto area.

These special presentations were made possible through the organizing skills of Helen Zukerman, executive director of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, and the generosity of Ellis Jacob, president and chief executive officer of Cineplex Entertainment LP.

This was not Jacob's first foray into ventures in support of children and young people.

Jacob, who came to Canada from Calcutta, India, as a student in 1969, has become a prominent member of the Jewish community in Canada and a leader in the film business in North America.

He has had a successful career in the entertainment industry, first working in various positions with Cineplex Odeon Corporation, Alliance Atlantis Communications Inc., and then becoming CEO and co-founder of Galaxy Entertainment Inc.

He later merged Galaxy with Cineplex and recently led Cineplex in a complicated and successful takeover of Famous Players. The result is that Jacob is head of the largest film distribution company in Canada, with 130 locations and 1,270 screens.

But it was his interest in young people and in teaching tolerance that led Jacob to donate the use of his theatres for the free screenings of Paperclips, a film about a group of middle school students in Whitwell, Tenn., who decided to do a project on tolerance, tried to collect six million paper clips in an effort to understand the Holocaust, and wound up building a moving memorial to the victims of the Shoah.

When Jacob first arrived in Canada, he enrolled at a college in Montreal and then continued his education at McGill University and received his accounting certification in Quebec.

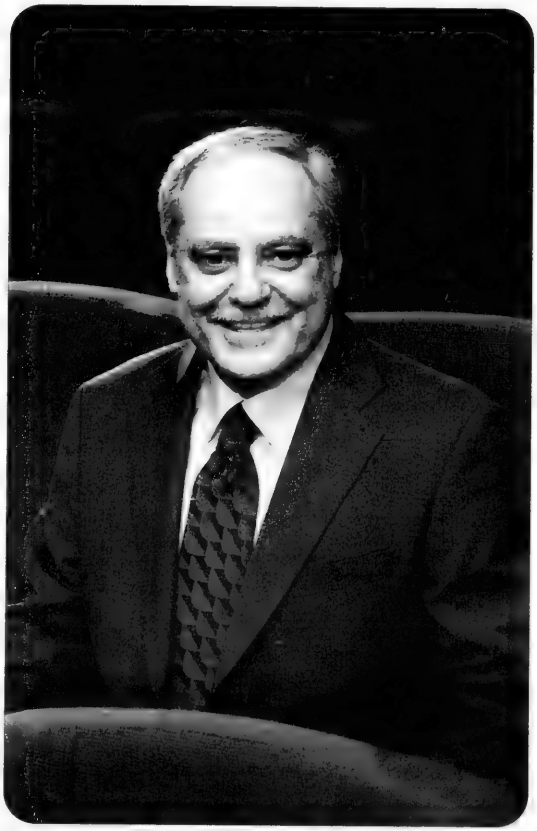
Later, he attended York University's business school where he received his MBA, and decided to stay in Toronto when he found work here. He quickly moved into the financial area of Cineplex, where he worked until 1998 when he moved on to Alliance Atlantis.

When he helped found Galaxy Entertainment in 1999, people in the industry were skeptical about his idea. Galaxy was created to provide state-of-the-art entertainment facilities in mid-size Canadian cities, which were under-served at the time and usually had older, out-of-date cinemas.

From two theatres, the company grew to 19 locations with 154 screens in six provinces – in only five years.

This spirit of adventure has driven Jacob and his team to the point where Cineplex now owns or controls a large part of the film distribution industry in Canada, with some of the newest and most-up-to-date theatres in North America.

And he has won the respect and admiration of business leaders around the world in doing all this. Michael MacMillan, chair and CEO of Alliance Atlantis Communications Inc. described him this way: "Ellis is an exceptional business leader. He has that rare combination of vision, passion, hard work, dogged determination and the ability to work well with people and inspire a team. He has demonstrated this throughout his career, and the recent successes of Galaxy and Cineplex Galaxy are testament to his leadership."



Ellis Jacob

Victor J. Loewy, CEO of Motion Picture Distribution Inc. has said that "his acumen to make essential forward-thinking business decisions, coupled with his personal integrity and dedication, have always provided Ellis the fundamentals to achieve what most would have never been wise enough to envision. He truly has effected tremendous change in the landscape of the Canadian film business."

With Jacob's success in the film theatre business, he has become better able to indulge in his true love – giving something back to the community. As a result, he has done volunteer work with the United Jewish Appeal, sits on the board of directors and the finance committee of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), has worked with the Organization for Rehabilitation through Training (ORT), is a member of the board of directors of the Youth Technology & Mentor Program (YTMP), has been on the board of the Toronto International Film Festival, Sprockets International Film Festival for Children and the Motion Picture Association of Canada, and is on the board of directors of Mount Sinai Hospital. He has also worked for other charitable organizations.

When asked about the future of the film distribution industry, Jacob said that while technology will keep changing, in his opinion, you can't beat the experience of watching a film on a big screen with hundreds of other people, and he has dedicated himself to providing the best theatres and best film experience possible at the lowest prices feasible.

Satmar feuds over succession after grand rebbe's death

ADAM DICKTER
New York Jewish Week

NEW YORK — As the world's largest chassidic sect mourns the death this week of the Satmar Grand Rebbe Moses Teitelbaum, the bitter, litigious – and sometimes violent – feud between two of his sons shows no sign of cooling.

In a flurry of courtroom motions, rabbinic rulings and shoving matches last week, the dispute rapidly shifted from designated succession toward a struggle between two men, each claiming he is now the new rebbe.

Fighting erupted at a predawn funeral service in upstate Kiryas Joel over the inclusion of a grandson of the rebbe among the speakers. There were conflicting accounts of what caused the unrest, which was calmed by state troopers and left two men injured.

Later in the day, both sides pointed to events they say designated either Aaron Teitelbaum or his younger brother, Zalman Lieb, the new rebbe. The rabbi's will named Zalman, 54, who lives in Williamsburg, Brooklyn, his successor, but supporters of Aaron, 57, who lives in Kiryas Joel, insist the designation is invalid. Some say the rabbi was suffering from Alzheimer's disease and not competent to make the decision, while insisting the board of directors of the central synagogue, Congregation Yetev Lev D'Satmar are the only ones entitled to make the determination.

In court last week, in both Brooklyn and Orange County, lawyers for both sides argued over a wide range of issues, including ownership of the rebbe's property and the definition of membership in the Satmar synagogue. A key issue was whether a supporter of Aaron, Berl Friedman, should have administrative powers on the Satmar board of directors, which Zalman supporters took as favouring Aaron in the dispute.

An appellate judge in Brooklyn overturned a ruling by an Orange County judge, Stewart Rosenwasser, who has long presided over Satmar litigation, and thus effectively nullified the powers granted to Friedman. Aaron's supporters are trying to reinstate the ruling.

The tension may continue to escalate if Aaron moves from Kiryas Joel, where he has presided as chief rabbi, to Williamsburg in a bid to take control of the entire Satmar movement, as the Times Herald Record of Orange County reported, citing unnamed sources. Zalman has long controlled the main Williamsburg synagogue.

At stake is control of some $500 million in assets and the leadership of an estimated 50,000 chassidic Jews here and several thousand more worldwide. Most likely, the two sons will each continue to lead separate factions, chassidic insiders say.

"Satmar is growing so fast that it is impossible for one person [to lead] and more than enough for two," said Isaac Abraham, an activist in Williamsburg.

Rabbi Teitelbaum designated Zalman, his third son, in 1999, to lead the main congregation in Williamsburg, to the chagrin of Aaron's supporters in Kiryas Joel, a suburban satellite community established by the first rebbe, Joel Teitelbaum. There are also Satmar communities in Monsey, Borough Park, and Lakewood, N.J., as well as in Israel and other parts of the world.

Dissent has occasionally deteriorated into fisticuffs, most recently last November at the Williamsburg shul when a supporter of Aaron defiantly entered the shul from which he had been barred by the rebbe. Pending rulings by an appellate court could stir more passions.

"Emotions are very high right now," said David Pollock of the Jewish Community Relations Council. "Many people believe all three court actions are surrogates for the contest for succession. I would suspect the court battles will continue for some time."

Pollock was referring to two lawsuits over leadership of the Yetev Lev D'Satmar shuls in Williamsburg and Kiryas Joel, on which the federal appellate panel will soon rule, and a third action regarding guardianship of the grand rebbe, now moot.

At the rebbe's Williamsburg funeral, which preceded the service in Kiryas Joel, there were few signs of tensions or passions. Both rival sons, along with their brothers and other relatives, offered tearful eulogies of the rebbe, in pre-arranged age order so as not to indicate favouritism.

As word spread of the rebbe's passing, Orthodox Jews outside Williamsburg who felt a connection to him flocked to the area. The street was packed from end to end with men and boys who pushed their way through to get closer to the synagogue. Across Lee Avenue, a section was set up for a smaller number of women.

Police helicopters hovered overhead and officers sealed off Williamsburgh Avenue behind the synagogue to allow dignitaries such as Mayor Michael Bloomberg to enter.

Outside the funeral, a man who identified himself as Rabbi Lieberman, declining to give his first name, said the rebbe's greatest accomplishment was not in fuelling the movement's growth, which was well underway when he took the reins in 1979, but in guiding it. "Once he took over, there was natural growth," said the rabbi. "There were already 25 to 30 classes in every grade [in Satmar schools]. He had to catch up and keep a little bit of control of the growth. That was a very big task."

Another mourner, Rabbi Hertz Frankel, an administrator in the chassidic school system in Williamsburg, agreed, saying the rebbe's considerable accomplishments should, at least for now, obfuscate the questions about succession.

"Why should we talk about factions?" said Rabbi Frankel. "That should be for another day. The rebbe's legacy is that he continued the footsteps of the [first] grand rebbe and strengthened the community he led for 27 years."

He continued, "This is not a community where people move to the Five Towns or to Flatbush. You have four generations davening together in the same shul. There are very few dropouts. This is the great strength of Satmar and Chassidism in general."

Anne Gluckstein was a liberated woman at a time when most women didn't even think about being liberated.

Back in the 1930s, '40s and '50s when most of her contemporaries were at home raising families, Gluckstein was out hunting, fishing, playing golf, tooling around in her powerboat and running a business.

She was a success at all her endeavours and on the evening of June 10 her old hometown of Parry Sound will honour her with a posthumous induction into the Bobby Orr Hall of Fame.

One of only a handful of women athletes so honoured, "Aunt Babe" will be remembered for her excellence as a golfer, her niece, Sandra Birenbaum, said.

"When she played golf, she won almost every time," Birenbaum said.

She was so successful at the annual tournament in French River, winning the championship cup almost every year, "they just gave it to her," she added.

Ray Pavlove, a spokesperson for the hall of fame, said Gluckstein started her golf career in 1938 at the age of 22. Over the course of her career, she won the ladies club championship at the Parry Sound Golf and Country Club 37 times from 1939 to '84, earning her the title of "First Lady of Golf in Parry Sound." She was a two-time winner of the Northern Ontario Golf Association Championship (1956, '58) and was a multiple winner of the French River Invitational. She won the Port Carling Invitational Tournament "at least 25 times," he added.

Gluckstein is also being honoured for her role in promoting golf in the community, Pavlove continued. She was a pioneer in bringing the sport to young women in northern Ontario, and gave lessons at the local high school and at the golf club. Her program of free lessons eventually became the Junior Development club. She served as chair of the Junior Golf Program for northern Ontario and as Ambassador for Women's Golf.

Birenbaum, who visited her aunt and grandfather, Jacob Gluckstein, in Parry Sound often during the summers, recalls Aunt Babe as an excellent athlete.

"She was the kind of person who would try anything. She was very independent, very determined and very competitive, competitive, competitive.

Birenbaum recalled her aunt leaving often for a round of golf after closing the shop and on almost every Wednesday afternoon, when all businesses in Parry Sound seemed to close.

Anne Gluckstein

The youngest of five children, Aunt Babe took over her father's business, Gluckstein's Ladies' Wear. Not only did she sell women's clothing and coats, she bought fur pelts from trappers, sold them to furriers and then retailed the coats to a broad range of clientele. People visited her shop from as far as the United States, Birenbaum said.

A successful businesswoman, Gluckstein was a prominent member of the Parry Sound community, serving on a number of charitable boards. She helped found the town's chamber of commerce in 1953. A year later, she started a women's business group, Pavlove noted.

Gluckstein closed the store in 1979 and died in 1991 at the age of 75.

"Whatever she did, she did well," Pavlove stated. Her golfing contemporaries recall that she competed well in matches against men and she even played a round with legendary ball striker Moe Norman, a game in which "she held her own."

Birenbaum believes her aunt's sense of independence stemmed from the fact all her brothers and sisters moved away and she was left to run the business.

"I think she knew from a young age she couldn't rely on anyone. The rest of the family were in Toronto, Sudbury, Stratford and Hamilton."

Aunt Babe's sister, Mary, who died at 99, along with her husband, Joe, ran Greenberg's Ladies Wear in Stratford. Their shop was a landmark on the city's main street, Birenbaum said.

The family patriarch, Jacob, moved to Canada from Russia and first settled in Montreal. He got a job as a tailor travelling to the lumber camps in northern Ontario doing an assortment of jobs. He settled down in Parry Sound and eventually married his sister-in-law's sister. They had five children – four girls and one boy. Anne was the youngest, hence "Aunt Babe."

They were one of only two Jewish families in the town and the other, which ran Adams Furniture Store, departed many years ago.

Anne lived in the apartment above the store in a building owned by her father. "Her claim to fame was that she slept in the bedroom she was born in," Birenbaum recalled.

One of Aunt Babe's favourite pastimes was cruising Georgian Bay in a cutter, Shalom, and later travelling to Sarasota, Fla., in the winters, where she kept up her golf game well into her later years.

She always returned to her home as "she loved Parry Sound," Birenbaum said.

As many as 25 of Aunt Babe's nieces and nephews will drive up to Parry Sound for the induction ceremony, in which Bobby Orr, the legendary hockey player, will make the formal hall of fame presentation.

Aunt Babe "will be the first [Parry Sound] Jew to be honoured and for sure the last," Birenbaum said.

Israel hammered at IIHF tourney

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Coach Jean Perron's prediction that Israel faces a hockey "Mount Everest" at the IIHF's Division I championship is proving true. Through three games in Amiens, France, the Israelis have amassed an 0-3 record, while being badly outscored and outshot even worse.

In their opener against Germany, Israel was pummelled 11-2, while allowing 80 shots on goal. Boston Bruin forward Marco Sturm got one of the German goals, while Oren Eizenman and Alon Eizenman notched the two Israeli markers.

In game two, Hungary shut out Israel 8-0, outshooting their opponents 37-12.

Japan beat Israel 7-1 in game three, outshooting Israel 59-7. Alon Eizenman scored Israel's lone goal. Israel closed out the tournament with weekend games against France and Britain.

The billion-dollar question

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

New Views

As I write, it's election day for Jewish Canada. Across the country, Jews are voting on who will represent Canada at the World Zionist Congress in Israel next month. Delegates from Israel, North and South America, Europe, Australia and South Africa will come together to form the 35th Congress. Their mandate: figuring out how to spend the more than $1 billion earmarked for Zionist and Jewish education and outreach around the world.

At least that's the idea.

Here's what's really happening: the Congress, which is held every five years in Israel and which has historically included all kinds of Jews with the mandate of strengthening Israel and Zionism, has become a highly politicized event, with a handful of factions vying to get their hands on as much of the funding pool as possible.

The run-up to this year's Congress has seen aggressive ad campaigns urging members of various Jewish social, political and religious groups to vote with their own, thereby ensuring as big a slice of the billion-dollar pie as possible for their movements' constituencies.

And what's wrong with that? After all this is an election, an opportunity for every Jew to have his or her say. That's what democracy is all about.

You might say, then, that the aggressive campaigning that has, in at least a few cases, included ugly scare tactics and smear jobs is all part of the process. After all, what election in recent memory hasn't included parties that attack each other as often as they tell us what they actually plan to do?

At least one of these campaigns seems to have worked quite well. The Orthodox slate has so far seen some tremendous success, receiving 24 per cent of U.S. delegate voting, which translates into 35 delegates heading to the Congress, up from the 29 Orthodox delegates the last time around. Orthodox delegate numbers are also up in Australia and Israel.

And you can be sure the new delegates will be siding with their own crew. The Religious Zionist Slate even operated a website, votetorah.org, that urges potential voters to "ensure that Torah values prevail by sending the right delegates to the Congress." The message is clear: the Torah says you better vote Orthodox.

I don't particularly go for that "we're right" (and, by implication, they're wrong) stuff (and the Orthodox aren't alone in using these kinds of tactics – they just seem to be the most successful). But the real problem is not the platform. It's that voting along the lines of religious affiliation will, ultimately, skew funding for all communities. As the Orthodox slate gains delegates – and a bigger chunk of cash – other groups that outnumber the Orthodox worldwide lose out.

See the problem now?

That's why this voting system just doesn't work. Some groups will very likely emerge from all of this with more funding than they deserve relative to their size in the worldwide Jewish community, while others will end up with less than they need to manage their educational priorities. I think increased funding for Orthodox youth groups is great, but I'd feel awfully guilty if that extra money came at the expense of similar Reform or Conservative initiatives.

It's not as though we don't know the religious makeup of our community worldwide – there is a wealth of Jewish census information out there. The simple and fair way to divide the money would be to gather the actual demographic facts and divide the money in a way that accurately represents how we all decide to define our Judaism.

This is our money. We all equally deserve the funding. Making this vote a question of right versus wrong means a lot of people will lose out. In the end, there's no reason to have winners and losers when we should all be gratefully accepting what we deserve.

Homemade Mac & Cheese

1 1/2 tblsp. butter
2 tblsp. flour
1 1/2 cups milk
2 tblsps. milk
1 packed cup shredded cheddar cheese
1/4 cup crushed canned tomatoes
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. sugar
dash cayenne pepper
dash white pepper
1/2 lb. small elbow macaroni cooked until barely done

In small saucepan, melt butter over low heat, blend in flour and cook about 2 mins. Beat in milk and cook over medium heat, stirring constantly, until mixture comes to a slow boil and thickens. Remove from heat. Stir in cheese until melted, then crushed tomatoes, sugar and 2 peppers. Stir in macaroni. Pour into shallow, buttered baking dish and bake in preheated 400°F oven until brown, 25-30 mins.

Poor man, rich man: a short story

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I sat in the corner of a room in my home listening to a conversation between two people I knew, one who was poor, the other, rich.

The poor man asked the rich man, "Do you really worry about money? I mean really worry? And if so, just sell the business and build a house, 'with one long staircase just going up... and one even longer coming down...' and fill your yard 'with chicks and turkeys and geese and ducks for the town to see and hear.'"

The rich man laughed. "Yours is a complex question. You know, I have more money than I need. My great-grandchildren will spend their days learning, or writing poetry if they so choose.

"But for your information, I wasn't always rich. In fact, I am like the Jews born in the dessert who later crossed into Israel. I found my 'milk and honey' only after I had a very intimate relationship with scarcity. I therefore regularly remind myself of my mazel and that I am deserving of my riches, by carrying a note in my wallet which reads: 'Moses described Israel to the Jewish people saying that it is rich and fertile, blessed with many streams and springs and a wide variety of flourishing food crops... You shall eat and be satisfied.' (Deuteronomy 8:10).

"My friend, a mortgage is of no concern to me as it was to my parents who lived on Oxford Street. I give 10 per cent of my earnings to tzedakah, but know, this is not always a pleasure. Trust me" – he smirked – "the joke about the impossibility of a rich Jew remaining deserted on an island is true. The charities that help Israel and people in need will always find you.

"Yes, I do worry about money. But I am a rich man – this is my lot – and watching geese in my yard is not my calling. I am on this earth to create prosperity and I would not change that."

The rich man paused, smiled politely and asked the poor man, "What is it like for you to be poor?"

The modestly dressed fellow replied, "What you ask is complex. I am comforted by the fact that poverty is not a Jewish value, and not a disgrace. After all, the great Hillel was a woodcutter, and his resume is quite impressive.

"Many years ago, I accepted that I was not born into a rich family and my dream to ride on a 100-year-old turtle on the Galapagos Island, will forever be only that. My children have a Jewish education and, in part, I am thankful to generous gentlemen like you. For this I am also ill at ease, because man needs to grow his own garden. The complaints of the well-protected Jews in the desert were evidence of this.

"Mostly, I agree that God determines our purpose on earth. I therefore see your assistance as His gift and am sorry to tell you" – he chuckled – "I am more thankful to God for my children's education, than I am to you.

"And like you, I carry a simple note in my wallet, reminding me we are all created in the image of God – rich, poor, royalty and peasantry."

The poor man made his way to the door. He looked back at the rich man and asked, "Tell me, do you ever feel guilty about having so much money, when so many others have so little?"

The rich man's touched the Magen David around his neck and quietly replied, "I do." He looked deeply into the eyes of the poor man and asked, "Do you ever resent the affluent?"

The poor man nodded his head ever so sadly and whispered, "Yes, I'm afraid I do."

A HOME IN ISRAEL

PROPERTY SUPPLEMENT
MAY 2006

The Canadian Jewish news

Dear Reader,

The idea of investing in an apartment or home in Eretz Yisrael has rapidly become both a fiscally and spiritually uplifting endeavor. According to most real estate experts in Eretz Yisrael, foreign investors from Diaspora Jewry, including many people from English-speaking countries such as the USA, Canada and the UK, have created a "buyers market" in major cities across the nation including: Jerusalem, Modiin, Netanya, Tiberias and Tzfat (Safed).

In order to meet the demands of this growing marketplace, we have produced several Israel Real Estate Supplements and Exhibitions in North America and the UK, all of which have been a resounding success. With positive feedback emanating from both exhibitors (i.e. real estate companies, mortgage banks etc.) and potential investors, we have once again produced an informative newspaper supplement as well as an exciting Israel real estate exhibition in your area. There are several new and important projects that have been highlighted in this edition. Representatives from all of the projects will be on hand in Toronto and Montreal to answer all of your questions. B'hatzlacha!

Cordially,
The Editor

PRIME-TIME PROPERTIES FOR CANADIAN INVESTORS

Israel Is No Longer A Real Estate Market For "Apprentices"

By Ken Stephens

The Israeli real estate market is on the cusp of an amazing transformation. After local real estate industry statistics showed that foreign Jewish investors from the UK, N. America and Europe purchased nearly $1.8 billion dollars of properties throughout Israel in 2005, two of New York's most maverick building magnates-Donald Trump and Shaya Boymelgreen- ascertained that Israeli real estate developers weren't "apprentices" after all.

During the past month, Mr. Trump announced plans to build an upscale apartment tower in downtown Ramat Gan opposite the Diamond Bourse (i.e. Exchange) and develop a mega hotel and residential complex along Netanya's picturesque seacoast. Mr. Boymelgreen has taken his ambitions one step further. Last month, he purchased a controlling interest in Azorim, one of Israel's largest business and residential construction firms.

Nothing can shake Israel's current real estate juggernaut, not even the shaky "ceasefire" with the Hamas-controlled Palestinian Authority. According to several industry experts, the heated real estate market is being fueled by three factors-local confidence in the growing economy, European anti-Semitism and an unprecedented aliyah spurt from the USA & Canada..

"In places like Netanya and Jerusalem, there are no more so-called 'pioneers.' There are growing and well organized expatriate Anglo (i.e. English speaking) communities in Netanya, Jerusalem and Modiin. In fact, in some places like Nitza Boulevard in Netanya or Ben Yehuda Street in Jerusalem, the English language is so prevalent you'd think you're in the middle of Trafalgar Square or downtown Manhattan," a prominent real estate developer told CJN.

THE HOT MARKETS

So where can a potential buyer or investor find the best properties? Indeed, in Israel's three fastest growing cities-Jerusalem, Netanya and Modiin.

Israel's capital city has consistently been a magnet for both foreign tourists and investors, who not only want to reach out and touch Jewish history; they actually want to "own" a piece of the Holy City.

Recognizing that wealthy foreign tourists and real estate purchasers are pumping large sums of money into the local economy, Jerusalem Mayor Uri Lupolianski is trying to loosen the bureaucratic reigns and offer more plots of land (large and small) for real estate development.

Several local and foreign hotel and

residential developers such as Alfred Akirov (David Citadel Hotel) and the renowned Reichmann family of Canada are in the midst of creating five-star hotel-apartment complexes just outside the entrance to the Old City. Mr. Akirov's company-Alrov (Israel) Ltd. is constructing the second portion of his spectacular Mamilla Project, which will also boast another hotel and a shopping promenade. The Reichmann family is on the verge of restoring the landmark Palace Hotel to its former lavish beauty. The Palace in its new incarnation, will also feature a select number of upscale apartments.

A Jerusalem real estate developer added, "The truth is, with increased immigration from the UK and N. America, families are no longer looking to purchase a simple flat. They are thinking about the future-their children, the local community, integrating into society etc. Some people start out by purchasing an apartment and use it for business trips. Then, once they feel comfortable enough making a living in Israel, the entire family makes aliyah."

Netanya, which is located less than 30 minutes from downtown Tel Aviv already boasts many attractive properties that are being built along or near the seaside promenade. The most spectacular project that is attracting interest from both business moguls and overseas investors is the "Ir Yamim" (Ocean City) real estate initiative. Surrounded by nature reserves and the pristine Mediterranean Sea, "Ir Yamim" will feature some of the most exclusive residential towers and upscale hotels, ever to be constructed in the Jewish State. "Several people, including tourists and businessmen have told me that the Ir Yamim project has the potential to transform Netanya into an Israeli version of Miami Beach," Netanya's maverick Mayor, Miriam Fierberg-Ikar told CJN. "Netanya features the longest beach in Israel, nearly 8 miles long, and with our close proximity to both the center of the country (Tel Aviv is less than 30 minutes away) and the north (Haifa is about 45 minutes away), our city has many distinct advantages. The best part about a project such as Ir Yamim is that you won't feel like you're living in a city with over 200,000 people. Netanya was always designed to be an attractive city that depended on tourism. With Ir Yamim and other local developments, residents will be able to walk to the nearby beaches and promenade and enjoy a high-quality of life." Of course, it doesn't hurt to have Donald Trump lending his name to an upscale hotel and residential complex that will be a critical component of "Ir Yamim's" real estate bonanza.

According to statistics, Modiin, which is equidistant to both Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, is the fastest growing Jewish city on the planet. Nearly two-dozen construction companies are in various phases of developing this "city in the country", which by the end of 2010 will boast a population approaching 100,000 residents. New immigrants from the UK, N. America, South Africa and Australia are moving to Modiin in droves due to its easy proximity to Israel's two largest cities, the airport (12 minutes away by car), affordable real estate prices and quality of life. Within 18 months, Modiin will also feature a direct rail link to Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and the airport, as well as a mega shopping mall.

Due to the increased numbers of Anglos who are looking to purchase flats or cottages in Modiin, real estate prices have jumped nearly 20% in the past year alone!

Recognizing this trend, both the Jewish Agency and the Jewish National Fund are now actively encouraging potential new immigrants to steer away from living in the center of the country. The Jewish Agency and the Jewish National Fund have been given a government mandate to develop both the Galilee and Negev regions in order to increase the Jewish population in these under-populated areas. To wit, the Jewish Agency and the Nefesh B'Nefesh organization are now offering attractive incentive plans to potential English speaking immigrants who wish to live in the Galilee or Negev regions, including discounted land rights and easy-term mortgages. Caveat Emptor!

Nof Zion

How Much Would You Pay For A Seemingly "Priceless" View of Jerusalem?

Unique "Nof Zion" Real Estate Project Offers Buyers A Stunningly Affordable Opportunity

While there are a variety of real estate opportunities in Israel's capital city, none of them can be compared to what is taking place at "Nof Zion", a unique project that is offering buyers perhaps one of the last unobstructed views of the Temple Mount, Old City & the Judean Desert at affordable prices.

When the "Nof Zion" project was initially unveiled to the real estate market last year, sales representatives were overwhelmed with inquiries from all over the world, including the USA. Since that time, construction has begun in earnest on "Nof Zion". The key to this project is the fact that new neighborhoods such as "Nof Zion" haven't been built within Jerusalem in a long time. And in "Nof Zion's" case, this will most probably be the first & last opportunity to purchase a piece of property that guarantees a priceless view of Jewish destiny.

It is a recurring dream for many Jews to reside in a home overlooking the Old City of Jerusalem. "Nof Zion" has turned this recurring dream into a stark reality-a self-contained private neighborhood of nearly 400 apartments, built on 115 dunams of private land. This uniquely designed project will also blend into the natural terraces of the Jerusalem Promenade slope, providing every resident with a private terrace overlooking the Old City.

The exacting standards that have been set by the developer of this one-of-a-kind project – the Digal Investment Company – are of the highest quality. More importantly, the price of a 125 square meter "luxury apartment" (4 rooms) starts at only $320,000 dollars (5 rooms=150 sq. meter-$400,000). Suffice it to say, that residents of "Nof Zion" will marvel at the attention to detail that has been invested in the project.

In addition, "Nof Zion" is showcasing various types of apartments, some of which feature private gardens and penthouses. Aside from enjoying the spectacular view of Jerusalem, the "Nof Zion" neighborhood will include a commercial center, kindergartens, educational institutions, synagogues, health club, and will be conveniently integrated into Jerusalem's new public transportation system. Major public and government institutions are also slated to be built nearby.

Sales of "Nof Zion's" luxurious apartments are being handled exclusively in Israel by Anglo-Saxon Jerusalem. Sales of the "Nof Zion" project in the USA are being conducted by the company's American representative-Mrs. Gita Galbut.

Pearl Skolnik

Pearl Skolnik Realty is managed by Efraim Weiss, CEO and nephew of Pearl Skolnik. Our main office is situated in Modiin and from here we service Modiin and much of the surrounding areas including Chashmonaim, Yad Binyamin, Jerusalem and Ramat Beit Shemesh. Pearl Skolnik Realty offers a wide range of services and as well as successfully marketing property and new projects all over Israel. We also deal with commercial and residential investments and property management.

All the real estate agents at Pearl Skolnik Realty are veteran Anglo immigrants who understand the needs of Western olim and strive to find just the right community for each family. They are very aware of the importance of securing the right home and neighbors for their clients, knowing that this is a critical part of successful integration into their chosen communities in Israel.

Some of the interesting projects Pearl Skolnik Realty is currently representing include those in Yad Binyamin. The "Torani" religious community with all its diversity will be at home here. No other religious settlement in Israel can boast such convenience of location with the quiet and pastoral setting of Yad Binyamin. One example of the projects which we are marketing here is the Chazon & Galili project Carmei Soreq. Pearl Skolnik Realty, as the EXCLUSIVE marketing agents, has successfully sold almost all the units in the first stage of this project and marketing of the second stage of this exciting project is in full swing!

Pearl Skolnik Realty is also EXCLUSIVE marketing agents for another Chazon & Galili project in Ramat Beit Shemesh, Ramat Kramim. The desirable location on the park, the exciting design, the high-level specifications and Chazon & Galili's proven track record combine to make Ramat Kramim "Simply the best in Ramat Beit Shemesh". Don't miss out on this once in a lifetime opportunity!

Chashmonaim is a beautiful religious Yishuv set at the foothills of the Judean Mountains and is approximately a five minute drive from Modiin. Building possibilities here are extensive. Semi-detached properties are being built on 300m plots and single family properties on 600m plots. The sky is the limit when it comes to design and building decision making in Chashmonaim!

Pearl Skolnik agents are also available for private or parlor meetings during their stay. Efraim Weiss can also be contacted personally on his cellphone: (347) 579-9098.

Sea Opera

Netanya has always been a popular holiday destination for the Brits, despite not having a five-star hotel; it has also been a top spot for UK Jews purchasing property, either for vacations or with a view to going on aliyah at some stage in their lives.

Firstly, it is only 40 minutes from the airport and 30 minutes from both Tel Aviv and Haifa – and, on a good day, Jerusalem is only an hour away. Secondly, local estate agents have for good reason called Netanya "Little England." As the wife of an ex-colleague who went on aliyah four years ago told me recently, "everyone speaks English here."

Construction is big business in Netanya, with new developments being built in both the north and south of the city.

I went to look at the much-heralded Sea Opera development being constructed on Netanya's Riviera, right on the beach at the top end of Nitza Boulevard. It is being built by Danya Cebus, one of Israel's largest construction companies and part of the Africa-Israel Investment Company.

This is a two-tower project with a unique design. It offers three-, four- and five-bedroom apartments and penthouses, all with breathtaking views of the Mediterranean.

I was shown around by sales director David Lowenstein, who was keen to point out the quality of the project. It has a granite exterior and every apartment is double-glazed to protect against heat and cold. There is an underground car park and a beautifully designed lobby with 24-hour security concierge and maintenance.

When Mr. Lowenstein took me to view a three-bedroom ocean-front apartment, what struck me immediately was the quality – beautiful Regba kitchens with caesarstone marble counters and top-of-the-range appliances, as well as Hans Grohe and Villeroy and Boch bathrooms and showers, are fitted as standard.

The apartments are, of course, air-conditioned and have their own laundry room and there is garbage disposal on each floor. Generously-sized balconies mean that most meals will be taken outside.

The project's first tower is finished and sold, with the exception of a couple of penthouses. The second building is under construction and David Lowenstein assured me that it is on target for the December 2007 completion date. This building will have four lifts including a Shabbat one.

The swimming pool and gardens are due to be finished three months after the completion of the building.

Imagine – when you open your front door, that sea view is the first thing that greets you. That's what really impressed me.

If you buy now, you are, of course, purchasing off-plan, so you have the advantage of choosing your tiles, kitchens and so on.

The first building has a beautifully equipped gym, which appeared to have never been used, so the plan for the second building is to make the room into a reception room for residents.

The development is selling very well to the Anglo-Jewish community, says Mr. Lowenstein, who speaks with great passion about his project.

A brief overview of the three great neighborhoods of Modiin, Beit Shemesh and Maale Adumim:

BUCHMAN-MODIIN

The Buchman neighborhood is located in the heart of Modiin, Israel's Number One "Growth City." This area overlooks a breathtaking, panoramic view. Buchman is a thriving community that is quickly proving to be one of the most desirable for residents - especially newcomers from English-speaking countries. Cited by GLOBES (Israel's Wall Street Journal) as the best real estate investment property going, the community is already proving to be a wonderful combination of the best of Israeli and U.S.-inspired culture! All 5- and 6-room cottages and luxury apartments include a private garden, private parking, storeroom and large balcony.

Beit Shemesh

Shainfeld Beit Shemesh is home to one of Israel's most popular communities. This exciting, well-established development, built by Yifat Hashemesh Ltd., is ideal for families of different ages and diverse needs who share a firm desire for the "most" home possible at affordable prices. Exceptionally popular two-story "Super Townhouses" are five-room homes with private entrance and parking. The upper levels have three balconies and attic, while ground floor units have a private garden. And now, SOMETHING NEW: 52 luxury two-family homes, each one approx. 200 sq. meters!

Ramat Beit Shemesh Aleph (THE RAMAT SHILO PROJECT): Accomplished building company Or Ami Ltd. has undertaken an exciting new community within the ever-popular Ramat Beit Shemesh-Aleph neighborhood. Well-planned, superbly designed 54 homes and apartments are now being built in the prime location of RBS-Aleph, near all communal and commercial services such as synagogues, schools, & a new yeshivah.

Maale Adumim - Mitzpe Nevo

This amazing new project - the final one planned to be built in one of the Jerusalem area's most successful knitted-kippa suburban communities - will include 42 units of 5- and 6-room homes in Mitzpe Nevo, the premier modern Orthodox neighborhood of Maale Adumim. We are also now building custom-designed 2-family houses in the "build your own house" area.

Mitzpe Nevo is a marvelous combination of a separate "small" neighborhood with clearly defined traditions, set inside a vibrant town, Maale Adumim, which has consistently topped the quality-of-life charts for all of Israel.

ON THE DRAWING BOARD: 190 luxury apartments in the sought-after Amona neighborhood of Jerusalem. Get information early so you can make an early decision.

Y.H. Dimri Construction & Development Ltd.

Y.H. Dimri has rapidly transformed itself into one Israel's leading construction companies. The company was founded in 1989 by Yigal Dimri, whose experience in construction and general vision have led the company through more than a decade of rapid expansion.

Y.H. Dimri offers its customers a diverse range of services needed from start to finish of the project including financial services. Other services include rigorous and aesthetic planning, quality finishing and completing projects on time. At present, the company is building and planning projects in 10 cities throughout Israel.

During the past few years, Y.H. Dimri has also invested time and effort in reaching out to the Anglo communities in North America. Recognizing that specific projects have become a magnet for investors and new immigrants, Y.H. Dimri's sales staff has met with thousands of potential buyers at real estate events in North America, UK and Israel.

"When we built a project in Beit Shemesh about five years ago, we recognized the tremendous potential of this market. So, we made a strategic decision to reach out and create a relationship with the Anglo community," Amir Cohen, one of Y.H. Dimri's fast-rising sales managers revealed.

In fact, Mr. Cohen's office is located in Modiin, where Y.H. Dimri has sold dozens of apartments and homes to English speaking couples and families vis-à-vis three very different projects, including the magnificent "Dimri Towers."

"We know that Anglo couples and families are looking for projects with high construction standards and also want to live a certain lifestyle with access to synagogues and top schools. Which is why, we are marketing projects in places like Modiin and Netanya where there are growing English-speaking religious and traditional communities," Mr. Cohen added.

The company's "Dimri Al Hayam" (Dimri On The Sea) project in Netanya is one of the centerpieces of an incredible municipal real estate endeavor called "Ir Yamim" (Ocean City). When completed in the next few years, "Ir Yamim", is expected to become the hottest beachfront community in the entire country.

Y.H. Dimri's Netanya project, calls for five 22-story towers featuring four and five room offerings, all with magnificent views of the Mediterranean Ocean just downstairs.

"The fact that Netanya has a well established English-speaking community, as well incredible shopping opportunities, makes our project that much more enticing for potential investors," Mr. Cohen remarked.

C. Raphael Projects Ltd

C. Raphael Projects Ltd. is one of Israel's most entrepreneurial real estate developers building high-quality projects in some of the country's most beautiful locales. The company boasts a pipeline of construction projects that are in varying stages of completion in three very attractive cities: Gedera, Ashdod and Eilat.

The "Pisgat Elran" project in Gedera consists of 78 beautiful 5 and 6.5 room cottages that are being built to the highest standards in a serene and private area. Gedera, is rapidly becoming a prime market for young couples and families, who wish to live in the pastoral Coastal Plain and still be close enough to Israel's major cities. Gedera is only a few minutes away from Ashdod and less than 30 minutes to nearby Rishon LeZion, Rehovot and Tel Aviv.

The company is also building in Ashdod, one of the country's fastest growing cities, where real estate prices have started to rise (especially in the new city center and marina) as a result of significant investments from aliyah minded European and North American Jews.

In Eilat, C. Raphael Projects Ltd. is constructing a stunning luxury vacation / residential apartment complex including swimming pool and jacuzzi where buyers have the unique opportunity to own a property in a city that is being hailed as Israel's Red Sea Riviera. The apartments have a priceless view of the bay and the colorful Moab mountains.

The staff at C. Raphael Projects Ltd. assists potential buyers through the entire process, including assistance with securing proper financing through the local banking system and delivering the apartment/cottage on schedule.

Representatives from the company will be on hand during the Israel Real Estate Exhibitions in Canada to greet and advise potential buyers on all of the aforementioned projects.

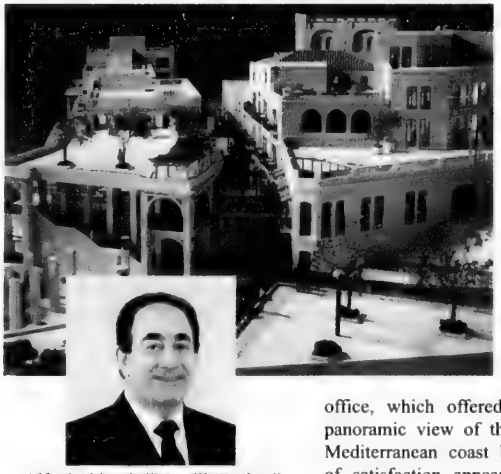
Hotel & Real Estate Magnate Overcomes Bureaucratic Bungling On His Way To Create Jerusalem's Ultimate Complex



Alfred Akirov's "Mamilla Project"

By Ken Stephens

Israeli hotel and real estate magnate Alfred Akirov admittedly lives for the challenge of building expensive mega projects. As he peered out of the windows of his Tel Aviv office, which offered a spectacular panoramic view of the city and the Mediterranean coast below, a smile of satisfaction appeared across Mr. Akirov's face. "You see those new apartment towers in the distance? I built them. I want to get up in the morning, look out of my window and say, 'That's mine!' It just feels so good to build things, whether they are upscale residential buildings like the TreeTop Towers that you can see from my office, or mega hotel & tourism projects like Mamila and the David Citadel in Jerusalem," he told CJN.

However, it would be a huge mistake to presume that Mr. Akirov is 100% satisfied with what he has accomplished in Israel. Mr. Akirov's fast paced entrepreneurial spirit has repeatedly clashed with Israel's fossilized political bureaucracies, which time and again have placed stifling roadblocks in his path. Frustrated by the lack of change and forward thinking within the country's political establishment, Mr. Akirov's company-the Alrov Corporation, which to date has invested well over a billion dollars in various projects spread out across metro Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, is about to pull the plug on future projects and turn their attention towards Europe.

"It's just too political here. Nothing is to the point. And no one within this bureaucracy is really interested in doing something for the better of the nation," Mr. Akirov claimed. "I honestly want to do more exciting tourism projects in Israel, like rebuilding the port in Tel Aviv that would feature new hotels and upscale residential areas. I'm also willing to invest at least another billion dollars in order to build more residential and hotel projects specifically for the American and European Jewish market. We take our own risks to invest in these projects but if no one wants us here… There is just no way to do it right now. Every two years we get this revolving door of new government ministers. Who wants to deal with these hassles? This literally stops the country from moving forward. We've tried everything possible to reason with them. We receive the red carpet treatment in the USA and Europe, so why should we be satisfied with receiving what I call 'black carpet' treatment by Israeli officials."

BAKAA COURTYARD

LUXURY IN AUTHENTIC JERUSALEM

In the picturesque Bakka neighborhood, The Bakaa Courtyard is being built. On both sides of a green avenue leading to a spacious park, covering 7,000 sqm, you can find garden apartments, apartments with private swimming pools and penthouses, each with a customized floor plan. At Bakaa Courtyard, you'll also enjoy an active community life that includes a gym, a playroom for children, a state-of-the-art spa, meeting halls and a synagogue for members. The last word in modern construction, combines an old world charm, making Bakaa Courtyard a desirable place.

At least one other builder confirmed Mr. Akirov's frustrations by claiming that he endured nearly 15 years of stifling political bureaucracy in order to receive the "official paperwork" (including the all important "Taba"-land ownership rights) in order for him to start building an upscale real estate project on the outskirts of Jerusalem. "You either have to have Israeli blood in your veins or just stand your ground and keep plugging away in order to survive the system," the builder added.

Mr. Akirov maintained that the local bureaucracy (at City Hall) is sometimes even worse than on the national level. He claims that the city of Tel Aviv has allegedly refused to let him build on a piece of downtown property that he has had in his real estate portfolio for the past 16 years! "I won't build another major project in Israel, unless the property comes with all of the paperwork assuring that I have the Taba," Mr. Akirov said matter-of-factly.

THE CROWN OF JERUSALEM

If there is one specific endeavor that has given Mr. Akirov a real measure of pleasure after numerous battles, it is the Mamila Project-David Citadel residential and hotel complex, which sits on a majestic plateau overlooking the Old City of Jerusalem.

Representing the "largest private investment in Jerusalem's history", the $400 million dollar architecturally compelling complex, which was designed by Moshe Safdie (he also recently designed the new wing at Yad Vashem), will double in size and capacity within the next two to three years. "In reality, the entire complex, which will eventually include another five-star hotel, 100 more upscale residential apartments, a 25,000 meter Shomer Shabbat commercial center, offices and a big car park with over 1,000 spaces, should have been finished in 2000 but the government that was in power at the time wouldn't allow us to continue to build," Mr. Akirov maintained. "However, with a different minister running the Interior Ministry in 2004, we were able to get the paperwork very quickly in order to start construction on the second phase of the Mamila Project. This is also a case where I have nothing but praise for the Jerusalem municipality, from former Mayor Ehud Olmert (now Prime Minister) to current Mayor Uri Lupolianski and city General Manager Eitan Meir. All of these people always offered their support despite the battles with the government. Everyone knows that this project has financial benefits for Jerusalem and is a tremendous attraction for foreign investors, as well as tourists."

As for the new hotel, which is being erected directly across the street from the David Citadel and will open for business in 2008, Mr. Akirov revealed that it will be a "city style" facility offering top quality standards. "It will more of a business style type of hotel. It won't have a swimming pool or large ballrooms like the David Citadel, but it will most definitely be one of the best," he boasted. "I'm excited when I go visit the site because I like the touch of good building. I'm also deeply involved with the architect, because I'm always looking to do something new and reinvent the concept of top quality service."

BUYING AN APARTMENT IN ISRAEL

There are a number of steps to be taken before buying an apartment in Israel. In the following article I shall briefly survey these steps.

Step 1 – Deciding the purpose for which the apartment is being purchased:
Holiday/Residence/Investment
When you come to buy an apartment, the first thing to do is to define the purpose of the purchase. There are three main purposes for which an apartment is purchased:

Holiday Apartment: If this is to be a holiday apartment, you should check the proximity to the sea, the Old City or any other place in which you are interested. It is extremely important to purchase an apartment where there are permanent tenants who will care for the building, rather than buying in a deserted place where the apartment owners have no interest in the building.

Residential Apartment: If you are interested in a residential apartment, you should first examine the residential area. Are there English-speakers in the area? Which synagogues are nearby? How far is the shopping center? It is also very important to know what activities are available in the area and what organizations, such as HOB, the AACI, etc.

Investment: If you are interested in an investment, you should examine rentals in the area. Who resides in the area? What return is there? Is there someone who can arrange to rent out the apartment? What is the potential for a rise in the price of apartments in the area? The condition of the apartment must also be examined.

Step 2 – What is your budget:
The second matter to be examined is the budget available for purchasing the apartment. This may be divided into two parts:

1. The budget for purchasing the apartment.
2. The budget for on-going maintenance of the apartment.

The budget for purchasing the apartment.
Firstly, with regard to the budget for purchasing the apartment, the price of the apartment is not the only amount to be paid at the time of purchase of the apartment.

The following must be added:
For a second-hand apartment:
Purchase tax, attorney's fees, currency conversion fees, real estate agent's fees, and miscellaneous costs.

For a new apartment:

Here I will explain the expenses:
Purchase tax: Purchase tax is a tax paid to the Israeli government when the apartment is purchased. Recently there has been a slight reduction in purchase tax for those buying an apartment which will be their only apartment in Israel. For the initial 559,350 NIS which is approximately $120,000 free of any purchase tax. In calculating the purchase tax to be paid, a distinction is made between people purchasing an apartment which will be their only apartment in Israel, and those purchasing a second apartment.

With regard to the first apartment, the tax is divided into three rates:

1.Up to 559,350 NIS 0%
2.From 559,351 NIS to 694,600 3.5%
3.From 693,602 NIS 5%

With regard to a second apartment, the tax is divided into two rates:
1.Up to 693,600 NIS 3.5%
2. Above 693,601 NIS 5%

I wish to emphasize that from the point of view of Israeli income tax, a wife with children under 18 are considered a single family unit, and therefore if the wife owns an apartment in her own name when the husband purchases an apartment in his name, he will pay the higher rate as if he owns an apartment.

Attorney's Fees It is most important to have an attorney who will examine the title and the agreement and will register the apartment in the name of the purchaser. Attorney's fees range between 0.5% and 1.5% plus VAT, depending on the complexity of the transaction.

Currency conversion fees: When purchasing an apartment in Israel it should be remembered that it is generally necessary to make payment in Israeli shekels and not in dollars, Euros, etc. When converting money to shekels, take into account a cost of between 0.1% and 0.5% of the amount that is being converted.

Real estate agent's fee: Generally the real estate agent's fee is high, ranging between 1% and 2% of the amount of the transaction.

Miscellaneous Among other things, this includes the cost of translations, cost of registration in the Land Registry, etc.

In a new apartment:
Contractor's attorney fee: A distinction must be made between the fee paid to the contractor's attorney and the fee paid to the private attorney. The attorney of the contractor does not represent the purchaser, only the contractor. The only thing for which he is paid is the registration of title in the name of the purchaser in the Land Registry. The attorney for the purchaser cannot register this type of apartment, because this is a new project, all of the apartments must be registered at the same time and by one lawyer.

Bank Guarantee: According to Israeli law, all payments above 15% to the contractor require the contractor to give guarantees to ensure the money. The most accepted manner of ensuring the money is by means of a bank guarantee.

Most of the building projects in Israel are accompanied by some bank which grants the contractor the loan for construction of the building. In order to ensure its loan as well as the money of the purchaser, the bank requires that every sum be deposited in a special bank account. Each amount that is deposited in a special account, the bank issues a bank guarantee.

The money is released from this account to the contractor in stages only after the contractor has completed a particular stage. The bank sends an engineer to check that the stage is in fact complete and has been built as required.

If the company goes into bankruptcy, the bank that guarantees the purchaser's money generally finds another contractor and completes the building. In such a situation it is guaranteed that the contractor will not receive money for work which has not been carried out. The cost of this guarantee is about 1.2%. It should be emphasized that that the purchaser's attorney should confirm that the purchaser's title is properly protected when returning the guarantee to the bank.

Linkage to the construction inputs index: When purchasing an apartment from a contractor you should be aware that the price of the apartment is linked to the index from the date of signing of the agreement to the date of actual payment. At times the price is linked to the dollar or the consumer price index.

Expenses after receiving the apartment: You should take into account that after receiving the apartment there will be current expenses for the apartment such as: house committee fees, insurance, municipal rates, etc. These expenses should be checked before purchasing the apartment.

Stage 3 – financing the purchase:
After we have decided what kind of apartment to buy and what our budget is, we have to decide how we are going to finance the purchase of the apartment. The first option is to pay the full amount in cash. The second option is to take a mortgage.

All mortgages in Israel are linked to a particular index or to a foreign currency. The three principle types of mortgages are:
A mortgage linked to the consumer price index, a mortgage linked to the prime rate and a mortgage linked to a foreign currency (dollar, pound, Euro, etc.). At this time the usual interest for the various types of mortgages is:
Index linkage plus 4%-4.5%
Foreign currency (dollar) linkage LIBOR plus 1.6-1.8% linked to prime plus 2%.

If you wish to receive a mortgage above 60%-70% of the price of the apartment, it is necessary to purchase insurance for payments above 60%, generally known as EMI.

The cost of EMI is very high, about 4% of the value of the loan. Due to its high cost, it is not recommended.

There are a few other costs which must be taken into consideration:

1. The bank charge for processing the mortgage is approximately 0.25%.

2.Life insurance and building insurance are required.
3. The cost of registration of the mortgage/lien in the Land Registry/Lien.
Nowadays there are mortgage counselors, and it is worth consulting with them.

Stage 4 – signing the agreement
Before the agreement is signed it is desirable that everything has already been agreed upon so that it is all included in the contract. It is important that there be an English translation of the agreement as well as all of the principle documents attached to it. It is important that the purchaser's money be protected as required either by means of registering a caveat or registration of mortgage or by means of a bank guarantee.

Stage 5 – delivery of the apartment
There is a distinction between a new and a second-hand apartment. Generally, second-hand apartments are sold as is, and even if flaws are discovered, you may not demand their repair unless they are hidden.

In purchasing a new apartment, the responsibility of the contractor for the apartment according to the law is for three years, and in addition, the civil tort law gives another 4 years.

Regarding new apartments, there are several dates which should be made note of:
Date A – Receipt of the apartment. On the date the apartment is received, a protocol is drawn up between the contractor and the purchaser. All defects found in the apartment must be recorded in the protocol if it is a defect which can be found by the eye of a non-professional. It is therefore most important to record all the defects in the delivery protocol. Afterward the contractor has one year to repair all the defects recorded in the list.
Date B – First year. The contractor must repair every defect found during the first year.
Date C – During the second and third years if a defect is found, the purchaser must prove that the defect is the result of a flaw in the work of the contractor. Following this, the contractor must repair it.

With a new apartment it is recommended to hire an expert – an engineer who will examine the apartment and provide a detailed report regarding all defects.

Miscellaneous: When the purchaser is abroad when the apartment is purchased, he will desire to have the attorney make all payments for him. The purchaser should insist that a special trustee account be opened and that you are provided with a financial report at least once every three months.

Olmert takes office and vows to change borders

By ETGAR LEFKOVITS
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — After four months of filling in for Ariel Sharon, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert moved into the Prime Minister's Office on Sunday, vowing to redefine Israel's borders and crack down on illegal Jewish settlement activity in the West Bank.

"In the next few years, we will change Israel's character to ensure it will be a state with a solid Jewish majority living within defensible borders that can provide security to its residents and separate us from those who must live alongside us and not among us," he said at a ceremony marking his move.

Olmert, who has headed a caretaker government since Sharon suffered a massive stroke on Jan. 4, had previously refrained from moving into the Prime Minister's Office in deference to the comatose leader, maintaining his previous office in the more modest Industry and Trade Ministry while he served first as acting prime minister and then as interim prime minister.

Indeed, the ceremony marking his move into Sharon's office, attended by his wife Aliza, scores of office workers from governments past and present and close friends, was marked by nostalgia and expressions of regret at the absence of the former prime minister.

"If we could ensure that Ariel Sharon would be here, I would wait without any problems as much time as was required before entering this building," Olmert said. "However, Arik is not here, and our prayers and longing are with him."

At the new government's first cabinet meeting earlier in the morning, coming on the heels of the forced eviction of three Jewish squatter families in Hebron, Olmert reiterated that the government would not accept lawlessness in the territories.

Preserving Masada

By SUE FISHKOFF
JTA

Rising 750 feet above the Dead Sea valley, the site of a mass suicide of Jewish Zealots in 73 CE, it is, next to Jerusalem, Israel's most popular tourist site. Elite units of the Israel Defence Forces hold special ceremonies atop its heights, pledging, "Masada shall not fall again."

But it might.

Not today, not tomorrow, but one day, as seismic tremors, climatic change and, inevitably, gravity continue to threaten the stability of the historic ruins and the mountain that supports them.

Engineering professors from Be'er Sheva's Ben-Gurion University of the Negev and the University of California-Berkeley have teamed up to make sure that doesn't happen.

Using state-of-the-art monitoring devices and advanced computer modelling techniques, and armed with a four-year grant from the United States-Israel Binational Science Foundation, Be'er Sheva's Yossi Hatzor and Berkeley's Steven Glaser are breaking new ground in geological engineering.

"Masada has been degrading for 2,000 years," says Hatzor, head of BGU's Rock Mechanics Laboratory and founder of the geological engineering team working on the problem.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Walkathon Nets $4,500

KELOWNA, B.C. — Some 20 adults and children took part in the Okanagan Jewish Community's second annual five-kilometre walkathon last month. The April 30 event, held at the Holiday Park Resort in Kelowna, B.C., raised about $4,500 for operations and programs at the Okanagan Jewish Community Centre.

WORLD

New Jewish Paper

HONG KONG — "Asia's first Jewish community tabloid," Jewish Times Asia, was launched last month in response to the rapidly growing presence of Jews in China and elsewhere in the region. The 24-page April issue includes an article on the Jewish community of Taiwan, an interview with Israel's consul general in Hong Kong and a feature on the 15th anniversary of Hong Kong's Carmel School. The Hong Kong-based paper had significant upscale advertising. "I have had the idea for about 10 years," publisher and founder Philip Jay wrote in a front-page letter to readers. The paper will be distributed free to all Jews in the region and will also be available at selected Jewish community centres and shuls in China, India, Japan, the Philippines, Singapore, Taiwan, Thailand and Vietnam.

Hamas Rep Gets Visa

STOCKHOLM — Sweden broke with EU policy last week by granting a visa to a Palestinian Authority cabinet minister from Hamas. Minister for Refugees Atef Adwan was given a visa to attend a weekend conference in Sweden, the first time an EU member state has allowed entry to a member of the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority since the terror group took power in March. Israeli officials were infuriated. France and Belgium had refused visa applications from other Hamas officials after EU leaders decided last month there would be no dialogue with Hamas until it recognizes Israel and gives up terror. The Swedish visa will allow Adwan to travel freely in 15 European countries.

No BBC Bias: Report

LONDON — There is no evidence of systematic bias in the BBC's coverage of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, but the network shouldn't shy away from using the word "terrorism," a panel found. The report, issued by a five-person panel named last year by the BBC, did note some cases of biased coverage, the Guardian reported, but it said that overall, the BBC tries to report impartially. Still, the report concluded the BBC "does not consistently give a full and fair account of the conflict," and in some cases favours the Israeli side, the London Times reported. Israeli deaths, for example, received greater coverage than Palestinian deaths, the report said, and Israelis got more air time than Palestinians on news and current affairs programs. That might surprise Jewish groups, who have accused the BBC of being pro-Palestinian.

Brandeis Pulls Exhibit

BOSTON — Brandeis University pulled a pro-Palestinian art exhibit from its campus. Among the images in the "Voices from Palestine" exhibit were Palestinian children dripping with blood and a bulldozer threatening a girl. The pieces were painted by Palestinian teens in a Bethlehem refugee camp at the request of an Israeli Jewish student at Brandeis. The Zionist Organization of America condemned the exhibit, and several students lodged complaints. A school spokesperson said the exhibit was yanked four days into its two-week run because "it was completely from one side."

Sudan Divestment

PHILADELPHIA — The Reconstructionist Rabbinical College has divested from firms doing business in Sudan. Rabbi Dan Ehrenkrantz, president of the college, admitted the economic impact would be "very small," but he said that it sends a strong message about the government-sponsored genocide in Sudan's Darfur region and that he hopes other Jewish institutions will follow suit. The move comes after recent rallies for Darfur across the continent that had heavy Jewish involvement.

Court Nixes 'Jerusalem, Israel' on Passports

OTTAWA — The Federal Court of Canada last week dismissed an application asking it to order the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to allow "Israel" to appear on the passports of people born in Jerusalem.

The application was filed by B'nai Brith Canada's senior legal counsel, David Matas, on behalf of Eliyahu Veffer, a Toronto teenager who had been frustrated in his efforts to have his birthplace shown as "Jerusalem, Israel."

The decision effectively means that Veffer "will continue to receive differential treatment under the existing policy," Matas said. "Eliyahu Veffer is effectively being denied his birthright by the restrictive policy now in place."

Federal Court judge Konrad von Finckenstein ruled Veffer's religious and equality rights were not violated by the passport office policy, which he said was adopted for "geopolitical reasons." Canada does not recognize Israel's sovereignty over Jerusalem, he noted.

Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith's executive vice-president, said, "We will certainly be communicating with the new [federal] government [about the policy]."

Jewish youths show Israel's colours at nightclub

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Many Jewish organizations worked together to bring a little taste of Israel to downtown Toronto in celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's 58th birthday, last week.

About 600 people gathered at Afterlife Nightclub May 2 for "Yom Ha'atzmaut Tel Aviv Style," a party organized and sponsored by Hillel, Canada Israel Experience, Israel Aliyah Centre, the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other Jewish organizations.

Israel Program Centre's regional director Michal Kaye, who co-chaired the event with Hillel's Israel affairs co-ordinator Orna Hollander, said she was thrilled that the party went off without a hitch.

"It definitely reached our expectations. It was a mixed crowd, mixed ages, and that's what it's all about. People had a great time. It was amazing," Kaye said.

The Megan Boys Entertainment DJ spun tracks that included something for everyone – top 40 hip hop, trance, house and some Israeli music that was thrown into the mix to reflect the party's theme.

Yom Hazikaron 5766

Israel's fallen soldiers remembered 'with tears'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

In honour of Israel's fallen soldiers and victims of terror, more than 600 people of all ages joined Israel's consul general in Toronto, Ya'acov Brosh, at a moving Yom Hazikaron memorial service last week at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation.

From the opening ceremony, with six young people marching with Israeli flags, to the closing musical presentation by the Renanim Youth Choir, comprising girls and boys ages 10 to 18, the sombre program in English and Hebrew honoured Israelis who have been killed in their country's ongoing battles.

Speaking about the 22,000 Israelis who have died in war and at the hands of terrorists, Brosh reminded the gathering to remember what we owe them and their families.

"They won't be forgotten," he said.

Zafrira Hotz lit a memorial candle. She lost her father Chaim Yoel Goldenberg in 1936 when he was shot in a village near Haifa. He was 22.

She also lost her brother, Lieut. Aaron Goldenberg, who fell in 1963 while serving as a pilot in the Israeli Air Force.

Others who lost family members made presentations reflecting their sorrow and grief, including Zipi Erez, whose husband was killed in the Sinai at age 31. For her presentation, titled "Each Man Has a Name," she was joined by her grandson.

Haouva Ratner, whose brother was killed in the Yom Kippur War at age 25, spoke what she called "Words for the Heart."

Benny Gruber recited Kaddish. His brother was killed while serving as an air force pilot in 1962.

The event also featured a number of musical performers, including cellist Daniel Domb and his wife Carey on the guitar, and K'el Maleh Rachamim sung by Cantor Marshal Loomer, who was later joined by Michael Rubin for a duet of the song The Last War.

In his poignant presentation, Rabbi Phillip Scheim, Beth David's spiritual leader, recalled the first postwar seder held by Holocaust survivors, and their determination to establish a homeland.

He said that out of love and respect for those brave soldiers who have fallen and "who we remember with tears," we must not relinquish hope or lose faith.

"We are resilient people," he said.

Synagogue event marks 'auspicious anniversary'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

More than 1,500 people, many of them students, crowded into Shaarei Shomayim Congregation to remember those who lost their lives in Israel and to mark the transition from sadness on Yom Hazikaron to joy with the celebration of Israel's Independence Day.

Sponsored by the religious Zionist organizations Mizrachi Organization of Canada, Emunah Women, Yavneh, and Bnei Akiva, the standing-room-only crowd prayed, sang, and later enthusiastically cheered and danced.

The consul general of Israel in Toronto, Ya'acov Brosh, opened the evening's ceremony by speaking about his personal memories of Israel's experience with sacrifice and success.

"In 58 years, Israel has emerged from humble beginnings to leading the world in many fields." He added that the transition from Yom Hazikaron to Yom Ha'atzmaut as night falls characterizes the Jewish psyche and the Jewish drive for survival.

He added that people died to make sure the State of Israel remains strong and vibrant.

"From its birth, Israel has been a land dedicated to peace. And I know we all share the fervent hope [that] a pattern can be found for peace, security and an end to atrocities of terrorism."

Speaking of Canadian diversity, he said, "We have to be vigilant when we see anti-Semitism. We have to speak up strongly against those acts and other acts of hatred."

He emphasized that "Israel remains a beacon of hope."

Rabbi David Cohen, an Israeli exchange teacher at Netivot HaTorah Day School, told about his commanding officer in the Golani Brigade, a very skilled officer who was killed at age 39 by a roadside bomb while visiting troops in Lebanon.

Rabbi Cohen said that on Yom Hazikaron, he thinks of his commanding officer.

Shaarei Shomayim's spiritual leader, Rabbi Moshe Shulman, told a moving story of two fathers, one whose son perished in the Holocaust and the other whose son died while serving in the Israel Defence Forces.

He recited prayers for peace and tranquility for the Jewish people, and he spoke of the challenges and dangers facing Jews today. He emphasized the blessings of this generation and the need to have faith in God and give each other strength.

"It is our collective and national responsibility to praise God and to thank God – to recognize these blessings, to acknowledge that while there are still challenges, as significant as they are, these are challenges that our parents and grandparents would have gladly traded for the challenges they had to face, wandering [as] exiles from country to country. The challenges that we face today we have dreamt of having for so long."

Edie Kalb of Emunah Women lit a memorial candle, and a song was presented by Yaakov Morel and Yonatan Shlagbaum. Rabbi Avichai Zehavi recited a memorial prayer and sang an Israeli chassidic song, and a musical medley by students from Netivot HaTorah Day School's children's choir was enthusiastically applauded.

To mark the threshold between Memorial Day and Independence Day, flag bearers from Yeshivat Or Chaim marched through the synagogue.

After viewing an audiovisual presentation of Yavneh, Bnei Akiva and Camp Moshava activities, among others, the audience erupted into cheers and joyous clapping.

The merrymaking later spilled into the shul's social hall, with exuberant Israeli dancing to music by The Velt, a student orchestra.

How great is our pride

One of the seminal commandments in the Torah's panoply of 613 is the obligation to teach our children the laws of Jewish life. It is of such paramount importance that we also find it at the heart of the Shema, the declarative watchword prayer of Jewish faith. As we all know, it is not merely technical rules that the Torah enjoins and our sages have enshrined. Rather, it is the transmission from one generation to the next of the framework and details of the entirety of the Jewish structure of obligations and values in the service of God, which is at its core, according to the imperatives of His will, the service of mankind.

The attempt to mobilize the conscience of the world to stop the genocide in Darfur, Sudan, is eloquent evidence that our children are learning well the teachings of their parents. Jewish youth – university-age students and younger – were instrumental in organizing the rallies held two weeks ago around North America on behalf of Darfur.

To be sure, Jewish institutional leadership has been at the forefront of the campaign to heighten awareness of the plight of the people of Darfur and to try to rescue them from their hell. The reason was powerfully articulated by Bernie Farber, CEO of the Canadian Jewish Congress. He told The CJN: "We [the Jewish community] understand the pain of victimization and genocide, and it's up to us to throw a fence of protection around other communities." Congress' efforts on behalf of the persecuted in Darfur have been sustained and unbending. We note, too, the exemplary initiative of former justice minister Irwin Cotler, who spearheaded the founding of the Save Darfur Parliamentary Coalition, and the grassroots pioneering of Norman Epstein, co-founder of Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan.

But it has been our students who have seized the issue and waved it with tenacity and steely-eyed determination before the somnolent consciences of the nations of the world – the Toronto rally was organized by five Jewish students calling themselves Project Equity.

In a poignant and courageous cri de coeur published last week in the Toronto edition of The CJN, two students, Jonathan Laski and Danny Richmond, explained to us, indeed pleaded with us – the generation of their parents – that "our generation is searching for a way to keep the Shoah alive through its lessons, and by doing so, we will also keep the spirit of its victims and survivors alive."

Josh Scheinert, a young Canadian intern in Washington who took part in the Darfur rally there, sent this message to The CJN: "In the last century, humanity failed itself too often. This is the first great challenge the 21st century has presented to our moral fibres. In that sense, it is our first chance to start anew. The atrocities of Darfur must signify a new era, one where the evils of perpetrators turn the indifference of bystanders into a tsunami of actions. Only then can victims of the past and the present begin to have some degree of faith in humanity."

Like our patriarchs, Isaac and Jacob, members of our younger generation are, in their own way, finding, understanding and embracing the faith and values of their fathers on their own terms.

How great is the pride we feel.

Yom Hashoah memorial program (1)

I refer my colleagues in the Vaad Harabonim to a well-researched tshuvah, Kol Be-Ishah Ervah – The Voice of a Woman Is Erotic, written by Rabbi David Novak for the Panel of Halachic Inquiry under the auspices of the Union for Traditional Judaism ("Group of rabbis withdraws from Yom Hashoah event," CJN, April 21).

One excerpt states: "Rabbi Ya'akov Yehi'el Weinberg was asked by leaders of a Jewish youth organization in France… whether it was permissible for them to sponsor programs that involved boys and girls singing Shabbat songs together… He reports that subsequently he learned that Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch and Rabbi Ezriel Hildesheimer had permitted the practice, as did a Sephardi authority quoted in Sedei Hemed. They permitted it based on the principle that 'two voices cannot be heard'… He also quotes Rabbi Moshe Isserles, who rules that anything that is not done in an affectionate way is permissible as long as it is for the sake of Heaven. Rabbi Weinberg says that since the purpose of singing these songs is to arouse religious feeling and to instill in one's heart an affection for the holiness of Israel, one can be lenient."

The tshuvah concludes: "As long as the singer and listener are acting… 'for the sake of Heaven,' it would indeed be permissible to listen to a woman sing songs that are quotations from the Tanach or from our tradition that praise the Holy One, Blessed be He, His Torah, His people Israel, and His Holy land of Israel."

I would add that our halachic tradition invokes the principle "Koach d'hatirah adifah," which loosely translated means: "At times, it is considered strong, courageous, and preferable to render a lenient halachic ruling." Does not a community Yom Hashoah commemoration merit this consideration? Otherwise, what is next? A mechitzah at Earle Bales Park when Kaddish and K'El Maleh Rachamim are recited? A ban on women singing prior to the Walk for Israel parade?

MY HEARING WAS DAMAGED FROM WORKING IN A FACTORY
AUDIOLOGIST
MINE WAS FROM ALL THE PEOPLE TALKING SHOP AND GOSSIPING IN SYNAGOGUE

I cannot help but wonder how a rabbinic body can get away with breaking one of the only remaining displays of Jewish unity in Toronto without being taken to task for it ("Why we chose not to take part," CJN, April 27). Can you imagine what kind of outcry there would have been if it was the Orthodox that pulled out? Where are the lay leaders in these congregations? Where are the Toronto Jewish leaders, champions of Jewish unity? Must we shlep the Holocaust into politics, too?

Rabbi Avraham E. Plotkin

Yom Hashoah memorial program (3)

I was not impressed by the logic of Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich's explanation for the Toronto Board of Rabbis' withdrawal from the community-wide Yom Hashoah memorial service ("Why we chose not to take part," CJN, April 27).

He writes of how the board is "ever-mindful of the fact that men, women and children perished in the Holocaust because they were Jews" and expresses its opposition to any event that precludes the full participation of all.

Yet despite all this high-sounding moralizing, this is exactly what the board itself proposes to do. They are well aware that the changes they propose will exclude the Orthodox community from this event. Do they not know that the Orthodox suffered and died together with all Jews in the Holocaust?

The Toronto Board of Rabbis should truly act in the interest of Jewish unity and retract its withdrawal. Yom Hashoah is no time for interdenominational politics.

Remembering a literary giant

By SIMCHA SIMCHOVITCH

On May 13, we will mark the 90th anniversary of the death of Sholom Rabinovitch, the brilliant humourist and classic author of modern Yiddish literature known as Sholom Aleichem.

He was born in 1859 in Pereyaslev, near Kiev, and died in New York at the age of 75. During his lifetime, he was a private teacher, a state-appointed rabbi, a grain merchant and a stockbroker. He lived in Odessa, Kiev and Kharkov; travelled throughout Europe; and lived in the United States in his final years.

But above all, Sholom Aleichem was a very productive writer. He wrote easily wherever he happened to be – walking in the streets, travelling by train, at home or away from home, and he loved writing during daylight hours as well as at night, as his daughter Mary Weitz-Goldberg says in the biography of her famous father. In addition, Sholom Aleichem was forced to write a lot because he had to support a large family and therefore had to constantly supply stories, novels and feature articles to the editors of the newspapers and journals where he worked.

In total, his collected works in Yiddish include some 30 volumes, not counting the unpublished manuscripts that survived his death and the hundreds of letters he wrote to family members, writers, editors, publishers, ordinary readers and admirers.

Of course, not everything in this large literary inheritance is of equal quality and level of maturity, but more than enough remains that has passed the test of time and is as precious, lively and fresh today as it was 90 years ago.

Sholom Aleichem remains the most popular and beloved Yiddish writer, and not only for Yiddish speakers and readers, because many of his works were translated into no less than 20 languages. His comedies and dramas are still performed in theatres, and the musical Fiddler on the Roof based on his Tevye the Dairyman is world renowned.

The key to Sholom Aleichem's huge success is in his God-given humour, which is as rare in Yiddish literature as it is in world literature generally. Among the small number of world-class humourists, Sholom Aleichem must be considered one of the greatest. In Yiddish literature, as well as in Jewish life in general, humour was a rarity. In the Torah, the Mosaic laws and statutes dominated, and in the other books, the harsh reproaches of the prophets loomed large. The tone of the later rabbinic Jewish teachings was also earnest, as it applied Jewish ethical teachings to the daily life of the Jews.

The same tone of earnest criticism and biting satire against the "dark sides" of Jewish life dominated the Enlightenment (Haskalah) literature of the 18th and 19th century, in Yiddish as well as in Hebrew.

At the same time, a living stream of folk humour and playful optimism found its expression in the jokes and stories of the folk jesters, such as Motke Chabad, Hershele Ostropolier and others. This tendency toward light fun and merriment was also expressed in the entertaining quality of Purim plays, Simchat Torah celebrations and family simchas such as engagements, weddings and circumcisions. Sholom Aleichem drew plentifully from these light-hearted folk traditions and, through the prism of his genius, turned them into high-quality humour.

This, naturally, did not take place all at once. He had to struggle to free himself from the satire of the Maskilim, especially from that of Mendele Mocher-Sforim, the father of the new Yiddish literature, whom Sholom Aleichem admired and from whom he learned so much. On the other hand, Sholom Aleichem also had to conduct a bitter struggle against Nachum Shaikevitch, who, under the pseudonym of Shomar, flooded the literary market of those days with cheap novels and romances that were very popular among ordinary people.

In order to fight this shund literature with more than public denunciation, Sholom Aleichem created a series of his own novels, such as Sender Blank, Stempeniu, Yosele Soloway and later on, The Wandering Stars, The Flood, and The Bloody Joke, many of them based on the lives of Jewish bohemians, klezmers, travelling actors and others. These romances not only have historical value, they can be read with pleasure and interest today as well. Through them, Sholom Aleichem succeeded in winning and educating Jewish readers and accustoming them to a better kind of Yiddish writing.

It was only then, after freeing himself from the satire of the Haskalah and after raising the level of the Yiddish mass-reader, that Sholom Rabinovitch was transformed into Sholom Aleichem – the good-hearted humourist whose golden smile and innocent laughter made the Jewish reader forget for awhile the tragic reality of Jewish life in Czarist Russia. First of all, Sholom Aleichem penned a vivid picture of Kasrilevke, a Jewish town with its poor but joyful Jews, full of spiritual energy and wit, and good-natured self-mockery, in spite of oppression and poverty.

The crown of this creative phase are Sholom Aleichem's monumental books Menachem Mendel from Yehupetz, Tevye the Dairyman, and Motl Peysi the Cantor's Son. These are three original and unforgettable types of universal significance, just like Don Quixote and Hamlet or Oblomov in western European or Russian literature.

Menachem Mendl is the prototype of the Jewish luftménsch who has tremendous energy and passion for great undertakings and ventures that always come to nothing. Sheyne-Shaindl, his wife, is a practical woman, a sort of Sancho Panza to her Don Quixotic husband, and she warns him that "kreplach in a dream are not kreplach at all."

Sholom Aleichem

Menachem Mendl is, therefore, a tragicomical parody on Jewish haste and gullibility that more than once misled some of our people on false paths – for example, the thousands of young and intelligent Jewish youth who devoted their lives to, and often sacrificed themselves on the altar of, the October Revolution and the Communist system in Russia that ended in such bitter failure in our time. Yet this same Menachem-Mendlish energy and enthusiasm was instrumental in the formation of an independent Jewish state and in the blossoming of new Jewish centres across the ocean.

If Menachem Mendl is the somehow unsympathetic representation of the Jewish entrepreneurial spirit, Tevye the Dairyman represents an ideal Jew. Sholom Aleichem raises Tevye, the simple wagoner and dairyman, to a universal figure of an ideal man, husband and father and good-hearted person. In his six stories about Tevye, Sholom Aleichem writes masterfully about Tevye's character – his unassuming nature, goodness and understanding of how to deal with people and their suffering.

Tevye forgives and even has sympathy for Menachem Mendl when the latter loses 100 rubles on the Yehupetz stock market that Tevye had invested in his speculative ventures. Tevye agrees to the self-selected marriage of his daughters: Tzeitl to the poor tailor Motl Kamzoil and Hodl to Feferl, the revolutionary who has been exiled to Siberia. Even when Chava, his beloved and talented daughter, falls in love with a young Ukrainian and converts because of him, Tevye's heart is torn from the conflicting feelings of anger and disappointment and fatherly love and compassion for his rebellious daughter.

And when his daughter Shprintze drowns herself because of a disappointing love affair with the wealthy Arontchik, Tevye cries out: "Why should people be so wicked when they can be good?" The simple Jewish dairyman is thus elevated to a Job who accepts his suffering with love, then submits to his fate and overcomes his despair through simplicity and faith.

The third and probably the most beloved of Sholom Aleichem's heroes is the orphan Motl, the son of Peysi the Cantor. Here, as in other children's stories, Sholom Aleichem did away with the concept of "little Jews," which Mendele and other Jewish writers argued robbed Jewish children of their childhood. Motl is a playful prankster who loves to laugh, play and sing, just like children of his age all over the world. They laugh together with Sholom Aleichem, their creator, in spite of their worried and troubled parents. They live in an innocent Garden of Eden of childhood, where they play and laugh according to Sholom Aleichem's famous saying: "Laughter is healthy; doctors tell us to laugh."

This purely innocent laughter of Sholom Aleichem has warmed Jewish hearts at all times. Even in the frightful years of the Holocaust in Europe, in the ghettos and in the death camps, Sholom Aleichem's stories brought healing and hope to broken Jewish hearts. In days of sorrow and mourning, as in days of joy and yom tov, Sholom Aleichem's words will continue to be heard and cherished.

Opinions

More bar than mitzvah?

There are times when even an Orthodox rabbi will lament tradition. In particular, I believe it's time to change our bar/bat mitzvahs.

Yes, we're too rigorous in our bar/bat mitzvah "traditions" (ones that I somehow neglected to study at yeshiva).

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

"Tradition" states that each bar/bat mitzvah must include a night affair, a game room and expensive giveaways. It must also have the proper caterer, florist, photographer, band, DJ and videographer. Despite my own inclinations, these "traditions" make me uncomfortable. To me, these "traditions" smack of true fanaticism.

George Santayana once said "a fanatic is someone who redoubles his efforts while losing sight of his goal." Our bar/bat mitzvahs are events only a fanatic could love. Having abandoned all but the most perfunctory religious rituals, they have become oversized and ostentatious celebrations with only a slightly religious veneer. The contemporary bar/bat mitzvah is an empty festivity, a party that celebrates itself.

Many have remarked that our bar/bat mitzvah celebrations are "more bar than mitzvah." Indeed, there are many non-Jews who are clamouring for a bar/bat mitzvah of their own (no Haftorah necessary). Two years ago, the Wall Street Journal reported on the phenomenon of "faux bar mitzvahs," parties for affluent non-Jewish teens who didn't want to miss out on a big party. Of course, the very existence of the "faux bar mitzvah" reveals a sad truth: that our "real" bar/bat mitzvahs are pretty phony, being much more about bars than mitzvahs.

This may sound radical, but it's time to bring religion back into the bar/bat mitzvah celebration. A bar/bat mitzvah should require some serious preparations, in which the young person has done communal volunteering and serious Torah study, as well as come to services for more than an obligatory three weeks.

At the celebration itself, Judaism must be a priority, not an afterthought. And after the event is over, guests should have something better to talk about than gowns and hors d'oeuvres.

At one recent bat mitzvah, the young woman got up to explain the theme of the night. It was not a kitschy movie or a pop group, but rather a quote from the Mishnah: "Whoever saves one life has saved an entire world." She said this quote inspired her to donate the gifts from her bat mitzvah to help buy an ambulance for Magen David Adom.

This act of remarkable tzedakah made it a memorable bat mitzvah, one that celebrated Jewish values.

I hope this young woman's generosity will inspire others to follow her example. It's about time we break tradition and make the bar/bat mitzvah into a religious event again.

Who really deserves an honour?

Brandeis University is granting celebrity playwright Tony Kushner an honorary doctorate this spring. It's an appalling decision for America's "only non-sectarian Jewish-sponsored college or university," which is named after the great American Zionist, Justice Louis D. Brandeis.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Kushner, an ardent anti-Zionist, once said that "the founding of the State of Israel was for the Jewish people a historical, moral, political calamity." Kushner is free to "wish modern Israel hadn't been born," as he has also said. But what prompted Brandeis to decide to lionize Kushner this year, especially considering Kushner's screenwriting input on the movie Munich, Steven Spielberg's morally obtuse treatment of Palestinian terrorism?

Kushner's free speech is not in question – he enjoys plenty. Rather, Brandeis' judgment and values require scrutiny. Honorary doctorates represent universities' highest values, their loftiest aspirations. Honorees serve as role models for graduating seniors to emulate – and name-drop promiscuously back home.

Kushner is one of many "progressive Jews" who happily lead the pile-on against Israel, feeding the ugly anti-Zionist climate of opinion on campuses and elsewhere. He is a kindred spirit of the 400 "progressive" rabbis who signed a petition this spring begging the U.S. Congress and President George W. Bush to continue financing the Palestinian Authority, even as European governments were refusing to pump money into Hamas-run coffers.

Proving that Jews are not monolithically pro-Israel, Kushner has many academic Jewish allies, in Israel and North America. Is Brandeis emulating the many Israeli universities that shamelessly pluck Jewish, and Zionist, heartstrings to fundraise, while fomenting a culture that demonizes Israel, America, and many core western values?

I leave it to the Brandeis community – and Brandeis' many Jewish donors – to debate Kushner's undeserved honour. But the Jewish community – and the many Jewish progressives – need the "rigorous, unapologetic skeptical inquiry" that Kushner and other progressives self-righteously demand in order to dissect all our biases.

Amid the bloodiest anti-Semitic outbursts since Nazism, progressive Jews have demonstrated a downright Christian, turn-the-other-cheek approach to Islamism. Yet the same people who can endlessly rationalize Islamist terrorism, and magically perceive a pragmatism in Hamas that few others can see, are instinctively prejudiced against Christian Zionists.

It's pathological. While millions of Christian Zionists support Israel, tens of millions of Muslims demonize Israel, and Jews, regularly. While right-wing American Christians have raised millions of dollars for Israel, Palestinian terrorists have launched thousands of attacks, eliciting Muslim cheers. While Christian fundamentalists lobby for Israel, Muslim fundamentalists demand Israel's destruction. While many leading churches have repudiated anti-Semitic elements of their theology, many leading mosques regularly endorse hateful Qur'anic passages that call Jews pigs, monkeys and liars.

I challenge my supposedly open-minded friends, who recoil at Christian evangelicals' friendship for Israel, to confront their prejudices by reading David Brog's new book, Standing With Israel: Why Christians Support the Jewish State.

Brog systematically, intelligently and convincingly catalogues evangelicals' support for Israel and debunks the popular slurs that doubt Christian Zionists' motives. As the rare Jew who has bothered studying Christian Zionist beliefs, Brog explains that a recent theological "revolution" repudiated "replacement theology," which claimed Christians superseded Jews as the Chosen People.

Now, rather than condemning Jews, fundamentalists feel commanded to embrace Jews because of a biblical verse most modern Jews don't even know – Genesis 12:3, wherein God promises Abraham to "bless those who bless you, and curse those who curse you."

Let's assess the real threat of Muslim anti-Semitism, which has killed hundreds of Jews already, versus the potential threat of Christian philo-Semitism. And whoever forgets that democratic coalitions often entail marriages of convenience and criticizes the broader Christian right agenda should consider Islamist stances on women, gays and other progressive icons.

Finally, let's ask the really hard questions: how much of this sympathy for Muslim opponents of Jews combined with this disgust for Christian Zionists is because Christians are western, white and too much like us? The great poet Robert Frost once said "a liberal is a man too broad-minded to take his own side in a quarrel." Such self-loathing today is dangerous, not just decadent. David Brog's important book proves that we owe our Christian allies a second, more informed look, a deep apology, and a renewed alliance against the modern world's true enemies of fundamental progressive ideals, such as liberty and democracy.

If Brandeis's dishonourable honour triggers such a debate and re-examination, it will have fulfilled its educational mission.

The shul I don't go to

We've all heard the story about the Jewish castaway marooned on a desert island. Rescued after 15 years, he shows his rescuers an elaborate hut that he laboriously constructed from mud and straw. "That's the shul," he says proudly.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

"Oh, that's the shul I don't go to," the castaway responds

What makes the joke funny is the self-perception that Jews can be a rancorous lot, that periodically we become disaffected with some aspect of the shul we go to and migrate to another, or establish a "breakaway" service. Pushed to the extreme, the joke has us imagine that one Jewish man alone on an island will find a bone of contention with a synagogue whose membership numbers one. (Perhaps he's displeased that the shul can't get a minyan, even on Yom Kippur.) It reminds us of the saying, "Two Jews, three opinions." Yes, we are a contentious people, stiff-necked and proud of it.

But the joke may not seem funny to future generations of Jews. Like the castaway, it seems that these days – at least according to a recent poll – many Jews on our continent have a shul that they don't go to. Unlike him, however, they don't have a shul that they do go to. According to a Gallup poll conducted over a period of three years, only 15 per cent of American Jews attend Shabbat services with any regularity – a figure far lower than the number of Catholics and Protestants who attend weekly services. The castaway in our joke defines himself as being against a particular shul. The survey points to a preponderance of Jews who simply don't like shul altogether.

While the poll focused on shul-going habits south of the border, and Canadian Jews have stronger affiliations, a casual survey of Toronto shuls reveals that while some fill up regularly on Shabbat, others are going through lean times, with far more empty seats than shuckling bodies.

Why do so few Jews enjoy shul? What would it take to bring people to Shabbat services? For some people, the answer might seem simple: a binding sense of religious obligation. Although the survey did not distinguish among different branches of Judaism, and included Jews with no particular affiliation, it's clear that the percentage of regular shul-goers is much higher among Orthodox Jews. But why choose one shul over another? What makes one shul inviting and another off-putting?

People turn to shuls for two basic components of Jewish life: spirituality and community. The two are intertwined. What makes a shul spiritually inspiring? On one level, the answer is highly individual. My brother, for example, has always preferred the "early minyan" – preferably a no-frills job with competent but quick davening, a (very) short sermon, and out by mid-morning. I've always been drawn to the late service (indeed, the later the better), with strong and enthusiastic singing, a thought-provoking dvar Torah, and a place for women's ritual participation. My husband prefers well-paced services and finds inspiration in a masterful chazzan. None of us likes responsive readings. And we've all gone to synagogues that have left us unsatisfied.

Some people come to services to talk to friends. While I once considered that antithetical to what shuls should be about, I have since reconsidered. Forging and solidifying the ties of community are important functions for a shul, and the Jewish notion of the sacred is very much tied to the concept of community.

But more and more, people are simply not coming to shul. In blogs and letters to the editor after the survey results were published, many people confessed to being bored or unmoved by the Shabbat services they attend, and to feeling like outsiders. Others longingly recalled particularly dynamic services they had attended – shuls that touched their spirit and drew them in.

One challenge of the 21st century is to revitalize synagogue life on our continent, in order to find more and better ways to speak to people's spiritual and communal yearnings. While no single formula will work, shuls we have loved can serve as models. Large synagogues may find that offering a variety of services will give them the freedom to experiment wildly in some contexts, and remain traditional in others.

And, of course, there is the counter-model the shul I don't – and would never – go to.

Jewish Film Festival impressions

The 14th annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival, one of the finest of its kind, ends its run on May 14, but there is still time to sample some of its choice morsels.

Shmuel Haimovich's Hebrew-language Summer Story is a sparkling gem, a gentle coming-of-age movie set during the 1982 Lebanon war. The film revolves around Gal (Kosta Kaplan), a kind, sensitive pre-pubescent boy from a moshav who learns the meaning of love, compassion and death in a few short months. Though Summer Story is only 76 minutes in length, it packs a wallop, leaving a viewer impressed by Haimovich's writing and directorial skills.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Gal, the moshav's summer postman, is enjoying an idyllic vacation, but a succession of incidents intrude on his life.

Ovadia, a farmer and conscientious objector, is arrested by the military police. Accusing Gal of having led the police to his home, he curses Gal and blames him for his arrest. A crop-duster lands in an open field, and Gal and his friend, Boaz (Itamar Cohen), are thrilled to be in the presence of the dashing pilot.

Gal's father is called up by the army, and suddenly he is the man of the house, a role he fulfils with effortless ease. As these events transpire, Gal is smitten by Haya (Aya Steinovitz), a beautiful young woman with a heart condition, and is pursued by Ronit (Eden Katz), a flirtatious girl of his own age. These scenes unfold seamlessly.

The war, a distant reality, is brought to the fore by Aliza (Tikva Dayan), the postmistress who constantly reminds Gal of the daily casualties. Meanwhile, Dadon (Albert Iluz), a local resident whose wife has run off to Canada, uses Gal as an intermediary to romance Miryam (Evelin Hagoel), an eligible single woman who rebuffs his advances.

In a jealous fit, Gal tears up a photo of a soldier corresponding with Haya. Being a good person, Gal makes amends.

Summer Story, with excellent performances from its cast, draws us into Gal's world, touching us with its simple poignancy and irresistible charm.

Until Tomorrow Comes, a comedy by David Deri, is another Israeli film in which human passions flare, sometimes at the most inconvenient moments.

Lillian, a Moroccan widow, cosmetician and wedding planner who lives in a Negev development town, has her hands full. She is busy looking after a fussy client, Liat, whose father, Elias, is a police commander and widower. Her dotty and increasingly eccentric mother is growing senile and cantankerous, while her sullen daughter, Etti, is having serious marital problems with her husband, Miki.

Can Lillian cope with these demands?

Deri handles these diverse situations with the aplomb of a seasoned director, keeping a viewer suitably engaged.

As the subplots unreel, Lillian wonders whether she should place her mother in a senior's home. Etti confesses that she plans to leave Miki, Elias makes a pass at Lillian ("You've captured my heart," he announces) and Liat gets cold feet about her impending marriage.

Until Tomorrow Comes is workmanlike and quite entertaining.

Hitmakers: The Teens Who Stole Pop Music, an exuberant 90-minute American documentary by Morgan Neville, focuses on a group of mostly Jewish, twentysomething, extremely talented songwriters in New York City who tapped into the teen market and produced iconic rock 'n' roll and R&B hits such as Hound Dog, You've Lost That Loving Feeling, Will You Still Love Me Tomorrow? and Be My Baby.

Usually toiling in windowless cubicles in the Brill Building at 1619 Broadway, these prolific songwriters, many of them from Brooklyn, churned out songs for Elvis Presley, Dionne Warwick, Aretha Franklin, Neil Sedaka, Little Eva, Bobby Darren, Connie Francis, The Shirelles and The Drifters.

Hitmakers, narrated by the actor John Turturro, concentrates on the composers Jerry Lieber, Mike Stoller, Carole King, Gerry Goffin, Barry Mann, Cynthia Weil, Jeff Barry and Bert Bacharach.

"We all had the ability to hear a hit record," says King (Klein), who went on to become a renowned singer.

"If you had a hit, you graduated to a cubicle with a window," observes Sedaka, who wrote and sang his own songs.

In the main, they worked for the legendary manager and music publisher Don Kirshner, who, with a twinkle in his eyes, recalls the halcyon days of the 1960s.

Hitmakers takes us back to a formative era in the music industry that exerted a profound influence on American culture.

Lover Other, the last film scheduled to be screened at the festival, is the story of two extremely unusual and unconventional women

Claude Cahun (1894-1954) and Marcel Moore (1892-1972) – who were way ahead of their times. Both surrealist artists and free spirits, they were half-sisters and gender-bending lesbians who lived and worked together, first in Paris and then in Jersey Isle, in the Channel Islands off the coast of Britain. When Germany occupied the island, Cahun – a Jew from a wealthy family– and Moore were summarily imprisoned by the Nazis.

Barbara Hammer's documentary about these still essentially unknown women explores a variety of themes ranging from lesbian identity to surrealism.

The following films were screened last week, but for the record, they rate a review.

The Children's House, an interesting Israeli documentary by Tamar Feingold, analyzes a failed social experiment that, until recently, flourished on kibbutzim.

In accordance with kibbutz ideology, the children of settlers lived together in separate quarters, cared for by nurses who raised them, all within earshot of their parents. But as the kibbutz changed, children's houses were phased out.

"We had 300 mothers and fathers," says Idit Levavi-Gabbai, a kibbutznik who saw her parents only once a day in the late afternoon. Looking back, she recalls the "sterile atmosphere" in which she grew up and the strict routines to which she had to submit.

Hagai Tamir, a former kibbutznik who works in Tel Aviv as an architect, is not nostalgic either. Bereft of his parents, he was lonely and now feels he "missed out." Shula Kobo, a third kibbutznik raised under this system, says she resented the lack of privacy.

Most of the old-timers have no regrets. "We had a cause, redeeming the land," says a vatika. Buttressed by file footage of happy children frolicking on kibbutzim, The Children's House proves the thesis that the best of intentions can sour.

You have probably never heard of Willem Sassen, a Dutch Nazi sympathizer, Waffen SS reporter and confidant of German war criminals in postwar Argentina.

But in Roelf Van Til's fascinating documentary, The Man Who Sold Eichmann and Mengele, Sassen is revealed as a charming scoundrel and rank opportunist who was Eichmann's ghostwriter (the transcripts played a role in his trial in Jerusalem) and Josef Mengele's predator (he helped the Mossad track down the Angel of Death, but the operation was called off), all for a hefty price, of course.

Chair of Women's Campaign & Advocacy emphasizes working women

New position for Judith Finer-Freedman caps decades of involvement

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Although Judith Finer-Freedman has just been installed as chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign & Advocacy (WC&A), she feels that her involvement in the Jewish community has been inevitable since one night 37 years ago in her native Tulsa, Oklahoma.

"It was in 1969 when I had my first taste of UJA Federation when my dad asked me to present a gift to Ruth Dayan – Moshe Dayan's wife – who was speaking at our home," says Finer-Freedman, who replaces Linda Frum Sokolowski in her new role. "I have been at home in UJA since I was a young adult in the New York Federation, the Houston Federation, and then here in Toronto. Whether we say 'shalom y'all, or shalom, eh,' we are all Jews with our deep traditions that hold us together."

"More women than ever before are in the workforce," she says. "Working women are busy – coming out to meetings or community events is difficult. Yet, they may have a desire to become involved with our campaign but perhaps have never been asked."

In order to meet this challenge, Finer-Freedman has already enlisted the services of a seasoned working woman.

"Judy Nyman, the president of nymark inkcreative solutions, has agreed to chair a working group of three successful women in our community who will help us learn how to reach out to this vital group," explains Finer-Freedman.

Finer-Freedman spoke passionately to the 130 guests at the installation ceremony about her recent fact-finding mission to Israel, which also included the chairs of UJA Federation Campaign 2007, Ariella Rohringer and Fred Waks.

"We stepped off that plane and into the world of programs supported by Toronto's Jewish community, and to sum it up, what a 'can-do community' we live in," says Finer-Freedman. "We spent a day in Eilat visiting the educational and social programs UJA Federation supports.

We spent another day at an absorption centre with Ethiopian families who had arrived only 24 hours earlier. Later that day, we visited Kiryat Moshe where I met firsthand the students who benefited from our tutoring program last year for high school exams or matriculation. This trip was a wonderful first step in my journey as chair. It inspired me to think of ways that we can expand our reach to help Jews both at home and in Israel." Liora Yakubowicz joins Finer-Freedman as vice chair of WC&A.

Israeli synagogue dedicated to memory of Edward Bronfman z"l

By DVORA WILSHANSKY

Participating at the ceremony were Toronto benefactors David and Rachelle Bronfman, Edward's son and daughter-in-law. Israel's

"When we first started to build Mishkan Eli," explained Lior Shtul, Eli's local council chair, "we believed that miracles happen when you build a shul. We continued with the construction, and didn't lose faith, and our prayer was answered by philanthropists from Toronto."

The moving dedication ceremony included a procession of Torah scrolls to Mishkan Eli accompanied by musicians and dancing.

A special memorial booklet was prepared which including greetings from Rabbi Aron Hoch of Toronto's Village Shul, Rabbi Moshe Shulman of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, Rabbi Shmuel Veffer from Toronto, and many others.

"We are sure that this building and the activities that will take place there will bring honour to the memory of Mr. Edward Bronfman and his long-lasting friendship with the State of Israel and its citizens," said UIA Federations Canada director general in Israel, Yossi Tanuri.

Home-grown volunteer named to top North American leadership position

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

A Torontonian has been named to the lofty position of co-chair designate of the North America-wide UJC National Young Leadership.

UJC or United Jewish Communities is the umbrella organization representing Jewish Federations and smaller communities across North America.

David Spiro, who has chaired UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Young Adult Division, and co chaired its Young Lawyers Division, will assume the role of co-chair designate in August this year at the UJC National Young Leadership Cabinet Retreat in Scottsdale, Arizona and will become co-chair in August 2007. He will serve along with co-chair designate Amy Warshaw of New York.

"This is the highest position that any Canadian has achieved within UJC Young Leadership," says UJA Federation chair, David Engel. "David has certainly proven himself to be an outstanding leader, and we know he will continue to excel in his challenging and exciting new roles."

Spiro is thankful to Engel for his support, and credits Richard Diamond as well as former Torontonian Paul Rosen for paving the way for his involvement in the UJC National Young Leadership Cabinet, noting that it was Rosen who connected Canadian young leadership as a group with UJC. "Cabinet is the best training and development program there is for leadership of Federations across North America," says Spiro. This training takes members through a wide-ranging leadership development curriculum over a six year period which prepares them to be effective future leaders.

David Spiro

Spiro hopes to bring this type of commitment back to the community level. "One of my priorities is to ensure that young people help the Federations to create a culture of giving and asking," he says. "In other words, that we all consider it a privilege and a mitzvah to give and ask others to give."

Spiro, a partner in the law firm Blake, Cassels & Graydon LLP, and an experienced tax litigator, is no stranger to Jewish community leadership.

In Canada, Spiro serves as chair of the Young Leadership executive, and sits on the executive committee and the Board of Directors of UIA Federations Canada. Spiro has been the recipient of a National Young Leadership Award from UIA Federations Canada, and UJA Federation's Young Leadership Development Award.

Spiro sees his community involvement as the continuation of the legacy that his parents, Rabbi Solomon and Tauba Spiro, and his grandparents transmitted. "I take their lives as examples in terms of their sacrifice and their dedication to the community," says Spiro. "I feel an obligation and a pleasure in having the opportunity to devote time and energy to the needs of our community."

Elimination of capital gains tax creates new incentive for stock donations

UJA Federation anticipates a sharp increase in gifts of stock thanks to new budget

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other Canadian charities are expecting a surge of stock donations as a result of last week's federal budget.

The budget completely eliminated the capital gains tax on publicly listed securities to registered non-profit organizations, including UJA Federation.

According to UJA Federation chair, David Engel, the substantial tax savings from this new budget provision will encourage more community members to either pay their UJA Federation pledge with stocks, or consider an endowment through the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

"We're expecting a big boost in stock donations as a result of this budget provision," says Engel. "The government clearly recognizes the importance of gifts to non-profit organizations which benefit all Canadians."

"This creates a much anticipated opportunity for philanthropy in our community," says Elizabeth Wolfe, chair of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. "Donors who have been thinking about their philanthropic legacy may find this new tax incentive to be exactly the motivation that they need to create a donor advised fund or other endowment at the Jewish Foundation at this time."

Jamie Golombeck

In the new government's first budget delivered last week, the Conservatives followed through on their pre-election promise to completely eliminate the capital gains tax on donations of listed shares, mutual funds and segregated funds to registered Canadian charities. This new rule should provide a huge impetus for a flood of sizable stock donations during the remainder of 2006.

To understand the impact of these new rules, let's assume that Mark currently owns shares that have a fair market value of $100,000 that he purchased many years ago for $20,000. He is considering donating these shares to charity.

If he simply sold the shares first, he would realize a capital gain of $80,000 and pay tax of about $18,000 on the gain, assuming a top marginal rate of about 45%. His net benefit, taking into account the value of the donation credit less the tax on the capital gain, would be about $27,000.

Under the new rules, since the capital gains tax would be eliminated altogether on the donation of the shares to charity, and since he would still be entitled to his full tax receipt for the $100,000 contributed, his net benefit would be $45,000.

The budget also indicated that individuals who make qualifying charitable donations of listed publicly-traded securities that were acquired with employee stock options will also benefit from a zero per cent inclusion rate on the associated employment benefit.

Note that while the new rules are proposed to be effective for donations made on or after May 2, 2006, they are not yet law as they must still be passed by parliament.

That being said, it would be highly unlikely (and extremely unpopular) for any party to oppose the passage of these new rules.

Torontonians join March of the Living

By CARLA LANCIT

For Anita Ekstein, the teens are a source of support. "These kids give a lot of strength," she says. Ekstein, a child survivor of the Holocaust who recently traveled to Poland and Israel on the March of the Living, accompanied the Toronto contingent of 170 young people, supported by UJA Federation. Ekstein told the participants how she was saved by a Polish family that hid her, and shared the pain of losing her parents and many members of her family.

*Anita Ekstein (second from right) leads the Toronto contingent of the March of the Living on the annual march from Auschwitz to Birkenau on YomHashoah, Holocaust Memorial Day. The Toronto delegation joined with 8,000 Jewish youth from around the world to march from Auschwitz to Birkenau on Yom Hashoah, Holocaust Memorial Day. From there they went to Israel to observe Yom HaZikaron, Israel Memorial Day, and Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel Independence Day.

"It presents a panorama of 20th century Jewish experience," says Moishe Kesten, chair of the Toronto March of the Living. "For kids this age it's a unique opportunity to learn about their heritage."

In Poland, the Toronto group also visited Jewish sites including the Madjanek death camp, the famous yeshiva in Lublin which recently re-opened, and the Warsaw ghetto.

"I think it's very important for young Jews to do this," says Ekstein. "The experience changes them. They get more in touch with their Judaism." While this was Ekstein's sixth time accompanying March participants, this trip was special because two of her grandchildren were with her. For Ekstein's grandson, Cobi Lechem, the highlight of the trip was visiting Belzec, the first of the Nazi's extermination camps in Poland and gaining a better understanding of his grandmother's past. His cousin, Orly Ekstein, concurs. "I've always learned about the Holocaust, but to be there, it was a whole different thing," she says. "It's kind of bittersweet," says Anita Ekstein. "I'm glad to have them with me, but it hurts me to see their hurt."

Threat to Israel has expanded in region, says prof

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's conflict with its Arab neighbours has widened to include the Islamic world, says an Israeli specialist in Muslim radicalism.

Whereas Israel once faced the enmity of 300 million Arabs, Israel now potentially confronts the wrath of 1.5 billion Muslims, Hebrew University professor Raphael Israeli declared recently.

"We are facing an immensity that is hard to imagine," said Israeli, a specialist in Islamic history, in a speech at Beth Sholom Synagogue co-sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University and the Canadian Zionist Federation.

The author of 18 books on the Middle East and Islam, he said that Israel's dispute with the Palestinians pales in comparison to the potential problems it could face from Islam in the future.

"The Palestinian problem is only a small part of the conflict," he observed, saying that the Islamic Republic of Iran, which covets a nuclear arsenal, has become Israel's "most vitriolic enemy."

Arab leaders, in public statements, do not dare call for Israel's destruction, yet Iran's current president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, has no such compunctions.

"You should be aware of the dimensions of the problem. Don't sweep it under the rug."

Even if Israel settles its differences with the Palestinians to the latter's satisfaction, Israel will continue to face threats from Iran, he warned.

Islamic fundamentalism cuts across the Muslim world in an arc from Morocco to Indonesia, noted Israeli, who was born in Fez, Morocco, immigrated to Israel at the age of 14 and served as an intelligence officer in the Israeli armed forces until 1968.

He said that the goals of Islamic fundamentalism are clear: to topple existing Arab regimes, to impose Islamic religious law on Muslim societies, to resurrect Islam as an expansionist force and to reimpose the caliphate.

"The malaise is worldwide," said Israeli, flatly dismissing the claim that the causes of Islamic fundamentalism are rooted in poverty.

Citing examples, Israeli pointed out that Osama bin Laden – the spiritual father of Al Qaeda – is a multi-millionaire and the scion of one of Saudi Arabia's richest families, while two of the wealthiest countries in the Mideast, Iran and Saudi Arabia, promote an extreme form of Islam.

In a reference to the resurgence of Islam in Israel, he said that more mosques have been built there of late than in the past 400 years.

Israeli, a visiting professor at York University some 20 years ago, said that Hamas, the winner of last January's parliamentary election in the Palestinian territories, has formed a strategic alliance with Iran and Syria.

Israeli added that Hamas, whose charter and leaders call for Israel's destruction, will not negotiate with Israel due to its opposition to territorial compromise.

"Hamas is honest. They say what they mean and mean what they say. Hamas' rhetoric is very serious."

By contrast, he claimed, the PLO was disingenuous, using the 1993 Oslo accord as a Trojan Horse to undermine Israel by political means and through armed struggle.

A hawk, Israeli described Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip last summer as an act of foolishness, saying that Israel should have demanded concrete concessions from the Palestinians in the framework of an agreement before agreeing to pull out.

By neglecting to engage the Palestinians in talks before the Gaza disengagement, Israel inadvertently encouraged Palestinian extremists to fire Qassam rockets at Israeli settlements near the border, he pointed out.

In a sombre prediction, Israeli said that these gunmen will try to hit strategic targets in Ashkelon, namely the power plant, the desalination complex and the oil terminal.

"It's only a matter of time."

Bialik celebrates 45th anniversary as Korin retires

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Uri Korin was executive director of the Bureau of Jewish Education in Indianapolis and had no intention of working in a school again, but he says he "got hooked" on Bialik Hebrew Day School two decades ago when he visited it at the invitation of the late Rabbi Irwin (Yitzchak) Witty, then his counterpart at Toronto's Board of Jewish Education.

Uri Korin

On May 16, Korin will be honoured at a tribute dinner at Le Parc, and the school will celebrate its 45th year. Almost 500 people are expected to attend. Korin, 67, will retire in June as the school's director of education.

Bialik opened its doors on Viewmount Avenue in September 1961 with 29 students and three teachers, following grassroots efforts by parents who wanted to give their children a Labour Zionist education in a day school environment.

At the time there were only three other Jewish day schools in Toronto: Associated Hebrew Schools, Eitz Chaim Day School and United Synagogue Day School. Bialik would remain unique for its Labour Zionist approach and Yiddish-language instruction.

By the time Korin joined Bialik as principal in 1987, it was "a large school [about 600 students] in a very small physical environment." Korin says he found the commitment of the school's board "absolutely captivating," and agreed to sign a two-year contract.

"I found this place much more fulfilling, working with kids and teachers, creating what I consider to be the most wonderful school in North America," said Korin in an interview in his tidy office in Bialik's new expanded building, which was completed in 2003.

A native of Hadera, Korin began his career in Israel as an elementary school teacher in 1959, relocating to a Jerusalem high school the following year. By the mid-1960s he had moved into administration and was supervisor of teacher training in the department of education at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where he received his MA in education in 1966.

In 1969, he began a two-year stint as a shaliach in Cleveland, Ohio. He returned there after another two years in Israel as a vice-principal. In Cleveland – where he spent eight years before moving to Indianapolis to work for its BJE – he was involved in opening a new Jewish high school. He also earned his PhD in educational administration and curriculum, from Kent State University.

His administrative style, he said, is that of a team builder with a "co-operative" approach. The one-time university basketball referee considers his board and his staff to be his "teams."

Under his direction, Bialik's student population has grown to more than 800. While the demands imposed by a school of that size do not permit him to spend as much time with students as he would like, he said he makes a point of going into classrooms when he can. "I tell stories on every holiday," he said.

Over the years he has also introduced the school's Mechanech program (an Israeli concept whereby each student has one teacher who acts as a conduit between school and family), he has incorporated technology into several areas of education, and – interestingly – introduced prayer into the Labour Zionist curriculum from grades 4 to 8.

"In my mind, there isn't such a thing as a secular Jewish school," Korin said. "My goal is to [create] an educated Jewish person... In order to function on a daily basis as a Jew, you need to know what's going on in a synagogue. Even before you grow up, when you go to a bar mitzvah – not only yours – you need to know where you are [in the service]. And I want them not just to read mechanically; I want them to understand."

His granddaughter, who will enter Bialik next year, is already complaining that Korin won't be there, he said. He and his wife, Dolly, also an educator, have two children and seven grandchildren.

'Everyone was in great spirits to celebrate'

"At 1:30 a.m., the DJ put on a horah. Everyone was dancing in circles, doing the horah – in a club in downtown Toronto. That was my favourite part," Kaye said.

Israeli flags, chocolate bars and party favours were scattered throughout the club, and a raffle was held for prizes including an iPod Nano, free passes to the gym at the Miles Nadal JCC and gift certificates to local restaurants and Best Buy stores.

The grand prize, a free trip to Israel donated by Israeli airline El Al, was won by Keren Katz, who coincidentally is Hillel's Israel affairs chair at York University.

Debbie Osiel, Canada Israel Experience's marketing manager and one of the co-organizers, said the party was intended to bring young Jewish adults together to celebrate Israel's birthday and raise money for a good cause.

"The $10 cover charge was meant to cover costs and raise money for an exceptional cause, Operation Promise," Osiel said, explaining that Operation Promise is a North American Jewish federation initiative to bring 20,000 Ethiopian Jews to Israel and to provide hunger relief for hundreds of thousands of elderly Jews in the former Soviet Union.

"People like coming to parties knowing that they're giving to charity as well," Kaye said.

"Everyone was out with great spirits to celebrate Israel's birthday. People are already talking about it," Osiel said.

She added that while she has been involved in organizing Yom Ha'atzmaut parties in the past, this is the first time so many Jewish communities came together to plan a single event. She said that last year, Hillel and CIE organized one party on the eve of Israel's birthday and the other sponsors organized an event for the next day.

"I hope this trend continues beyond Yom Ha'atzmaut and we can do more things together. When the Jewish organizations work together and make things so successful, it makes the community better."

Baycrest to open 'Café Europa' for Holocaust survivors

Baycrest has received a $500,000 grant from the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration to expand its community outreach.

As part of its new outreach programming, Baycrest, which cares for the largest group of aging Holocaust survivors in Canada, will open a café for Holocaust survivors.

"This is an important investment in programs to support and care for aging Holocaust survivors," said Ontario Citizenship and Immigration Minister Mike Colle.

"Baycrest's Café Europa will provide a new weekly drop-in place for survivors to relax and socialize. I'm pleased to be supporting such a great program."

On hand for the minister's recent announcement at Baycrest were Grade 6 students from Thornhill Woods Public School, who created colourful signage for the new café. The children gave a presentation that included dramatic readings and musical performances. Also in attendance were Holocaust survivors, including child survivor Joe Gottdenker.

"I commend our provincial government for recognizing the needs of survivors, particularly as they are getting older and dealing with health problems. They require emotional support and social interaction more than ever," said Gottdenker, who was hidden by a farm family in Poland during World War II when he was an infant.

Toronto is home to approximately 12,000 Holocaust survivors, who comprise almost half of Canada's total survivor population. Aging survivors often have few or no extended family members and look to their fellow survivors for emotional, social and familial support.

The Baycrest Café Europa, which opens this fall, will be modelled after similarly named cafés for Holocaust survivors in Europe, United States, United Kingdom and Israel. Along with refreshments, the café will provide entertainment, host discussion groups and bring in guest speakers.

"This is a very exciting addition to the resources available for Holocaust survivors in the Toronto area," said Paula David, a social worker and the co-ordinator of the Holocaust Resource Program at Baycrest. "So many survivors just need a little support to relax, socialize and enjoy themselves. Now we will have a venue for them."

In addition to the café, to be located at the Joseph E. and Minnie Wagman Centre, Baycrest will launch a Living Narratives Project to record the life stories of survivors who live at Baycrest and/ or attend the café and an inter-generational Remembrance Day Project with students in York Region, emphasizing diversity and understanding between cultures, religions and ethnic groups. The funding will also bring Café Europa programming to Holocaust survivors who spend much of their time as caregivers for spouses in Baycrest's nursing home and hospital.

Israel Bonds honoree 'humbled' by Meir award

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Toby Feldberg has long admired Golda Meir, and soon her name will be linked with Israel's iron-willed former prime minister.

On May 23, Feldberg will receive the Golda Meir leadership award from the Israel Bonds Women's Division, in recognition of her commitment to the Jewish community and her achievements as a supporter of numerous organizations.

Meir was one of the reasons Feldberg decided to accept the award, after having declined the honour in previous years due to her modest nature and a desire to stay out of the limelight. Even still, the humble Feldberg had trouble deciding to accept the honour this year.

"It was very difficult when they asked me if I would take it on," she said. "I think Golda Meir was one of the most wonderful, clever, brave women in the world. I didn't think I was worthy to be honoured with her name."

But after some convincing, she changed her mind.

"I found it fascinating that my name would be linked with hers," Feldberg said, adding that she was also swayed when others told her that she should accept the award because it would help her fundraising efforts.

The dinner and awards ceremony, which take place at the Elgin Theatre, will be followed by the opening night performance of Golda's Balcony, the Broadway hit that will be in Toronto for eight shows. This will be followed by a reception to be attended by the show's star, Valerie Harper.

It's the first time Israel Bonds is holding an evening affair in the past the awards ceremony has been a luncheon event.

Attending Golda's Balcony as part of the evening has a special significance for Feldberg.

About 30 years ago, when she was a volunteer with B'nai Brith, Feldberg was elected to chair Israel Bonds and was asked to do a fundraising function. She ended up organizing an event at the Leah Posluns Theatre that included a performance about the life of Golda Meir.

"There's a connection," she said, amused at how her link to Golda is now coming full circle.

Feldberg first started buying Israel Bonds when she was a volunteer with B'nai Brith and was part of a women's club in which each member put in $10 every month and at the end there was a draw and one person won a $100 bond.

"This is something we supported before we could even afford it," she said.

Over the past 35 years, Feldberg has volunteered for organizations such as B'nai Brith, the Canadian Cancer Society and the Heart and Stroke Foundation.

Along with husband Saul Feldberg, she supports several charities and organizations, including Yad Vashem, the Jewish National Fund, UJA, Baycrest, the Hospital for Sick Children and the Israel Cancer Research Fund. She is also president of Beit Halochem Canada, which provides aid to disabled veterans of Israel, and she chairs the Canadian Committee for the Haifa Foundation.

"She's so important to us that it's hard to imagine," said Maya Goldenberg, executive director of the Canadian Committee for the Haifa Foundation.

Married for 48 years to husband Saul, she has four children and eight grandchildren, the youngest of whom was born a few months ago.

But the route to such a full life hasn't been completely smooth.

"My biggest regret is that I don't even know what my grandparents look like, because there are no pictures of them," she said.

She immigrated to Toronto with her parents and sister from Poland via Israel in 1951, at the age of 11. She met Saul Feldberg when she was a 15-year-old student at Central Commerce Collegiate. Five years her senior, Saul had also immigrated with his family to Toronto from Poland via Israel.

Toby Feldberg had planned to pursue secretarial work, but at age 17, she got married, and the couple's first son, David, was born when she was 18. Four years later, son Bernie was born, followed by daughter Janice and then youngest son Joel.

Before her daughter was born in 1966, her husband established Global Upholstery Co., an office furniture manufacturer that celebrated its 40-year anniversary in March.

When it was first founded, Feldberg was one of the company's three employees (it now employs thousands) and was actively involved in the business, doing deliveries and attending trade shows.

When she was pregnant with her youngest son, Feldberg decided to become an active volunteer.

"I said I've got to do something, for me and for the betterment of people," she said.

She joined B'nai Brith and became a tireless volunteer, doing everything from visiting the elderly in hospitals to delivering meals on wheels. She also became involved in other organizations, helping out wherever she could.

Her support for Israel dates back to 1967, when, accompanied by her husband and two friends, she went to a Jewish neighbourhood and knocked on doors, trying to collect money for Israel.

She said she and Saul have "always had a heart for Israel."

But despite her incredible achievement as a volunteer, she still hesitates about being bestowed with an award in named for Meir.

"I'm very humbled. I still think I don't know if I deserve being linked with her," Feldberg said.

Jewish Indiana Jones to lead dig in Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Alex Gropper, known to some in the community as the Jewish Indiana Jones, will lead a group of Canadians to excavate one of most famous archeological sites in the Mediterranean.

Gropper, the 59-year-old president of the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies at the University of Toronto's St. Michael's College and a teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto for the past 34 years, is recruiting volunteers who are interested in a different kind of vacation adventure – to Tel Dor in Israel.

From July 1 to 16, Gropper and his Canadian contingent will travel to Israel to join a group of professionals and students from universities in Israel and North America, including McMaster University and the University of Saskatchewan, in the hope of uncovering clues about the Middle East's connection to the West more than 3,000 years ago.

Gropper said he became involved with the Tel Dor Project at the request of Prof. Ayelet Gilboa of Haifa University, the co-director of the Tel Dor excavations, who commissioned him to help organize activities for volunteers who want to take part in the dig.

"I thought it would be a shame to give up this opportunity," Gropper said. "It's a labour of love. I've been involved with excavations in Israel since 1968."

Israel is rich with important archeological sites, but Gropper said Tel Dor is one of the key projects in the Mediterranean for a number of reasons.

"Obviously, it's visually stunning. It's on a lagoon, it's on the coast. It gives us information on the contacts ancient Israel and the entire Middle East had with the West, with Greece and beyond. Dor is one of the keys to unlocking the riddles of the Sea Peoples [a loose confederation of people from the eastern Mediterranean who attempted to enter Egyptian territory around 1200 BCE].

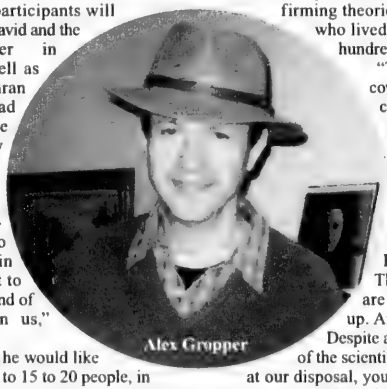
"Among the Sea Peoples, some of the best known are the Philistines, whom we are all familiar with from the Bible. But what people don't realize is that the earliest Philistine pottery, which archeologists use as an indicator of cultural connections, is virtually identical to the last phases to the Mycenaean Greek pottery. And the Mycenaean Greeks are those who supposedly besieged Troy.

"So here, in this one period, we have the two major events in the history of Western civilization that are connected – that is the exodus from Egypt and the Trojan war."

Although much of the focus will be on the dig in Tel Dor, participants will also be treated to a tour of other major archeological sites in Israel, and they will be given time to enjoy the amenities at the four-star Nachsholim resort on the beach of the Tantura lagoon, just minutes away from the dig.

"We begin at about 5 in the morning, wrap up around 1 p.m. with breaks in between, and there is a chance afterward to take part in workshops, lectures and a chance to enjoy the resort," Gropper said.

"Although we have an itinerary, if people want to go off the track, that's part of the fun of it."



Alex Gropper

On the tour, participants will visit the City of David and the Jewish Quarter in Jerusalem, as well as Masada, Qumran (where the Dead Sea Scrolls were found) and many other well-known sites.

"This is a perfect opportunity for people who are interested in history and want to take a different kind of vacation to join us," Gropper said.

He added that he would like to limit the group to 15 to 20 people, in order to keep it intimate. The cost of the two-week trip is $4,495, and those who are interested in taking part should call Miki Friendly at 416-840-0855.

Four or five people will be assigned to a "square" of the dig and will be supervised by staff members – usually graduate students from the participating universities, who will instruct the group on how to dig and what to look for.

While people have been making physical discoveries in the area since 1980, Gropper said he is more interested in putting together the historical pieces of the puzzle and confirming theories about the people who lived in the Middle East hundreds of years ago.

"The most recent discoveries have included coins, ceilings, scarabs [a representation of a beetle, an Egyptian symbol of the soul], but it's not so much the physical find, it's how it all fits in… It's an ongoing thing. There are finds that are constantly coming up. And you never know. Despite all the advancements of the scientific methods we have at our disposal, you could just by fluke run across something that is going to change what we know. That's part of the appeal."

He added: "The fascinating thing about it is that once the dirt gets under your fingernails, it goes to your heart. It hooks you. It's a passion, and this is a chance to learn first-hand about the history of Israel."

Canadian, Russian cousins reconnect after 80 years

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

From left, Doug Strelshik, his cousin Misha Strelchik, and Misha's grandson, Boris, are delighted to have reconnected the Russian and Canadian branches of their family.

Mikhail (Misha) Strelchik speaks no English, but when he visited The CJN's office just before Passover and described meeting his Toronto cousins at the Moscow airport for the first time last summer, the animation in his voice, along with a poignant gesture – clasping his hands in front of his heart – clearly conveyed his feelings about reconnecting with the Canadian branch of his family more than 80 years after his uncle, Shmil Strelczyk, left Russia.

Samuel Strelshik, as he came to be known, left his Ukrainian hometown of Terlitza in late 1923. He arrived in Canada in January 1924, with $13 in his pocket, and he and his wife Dora settled in Montreal. Samuel exchanged letters with his four siblings who had stayed behind until the late 1940s, after which Russian government policy made it impossible for them to be in touch with foreigners.

According to Misha, in the late 1920s, once Samuel was settled, he extended an invitation to Misha's father and his other siblings to join him. Misha's father, a committed Communist and Trotskyite, wouldn't hear of it.

Almost 80 years later, in 2004, Samuel's son, Arthur, received a long-distance phone call at his Montreal home. It was Misha's grandson, Boris, calling from Moscow with Misha at his side to re-establish a family connection.

Boris, now 20, who visited Toronto and Montreal with his grandfather for Passover, recalls hearing skepticism in Arthur's voice at first. "Then he believed me, but it was hard to talk on the phone."

E-mail turned out to be easier, and Arthur's son, Douglas, 46, a Toronto lawyer, became Boris' main contact. Last summer, Doug and his son Sam, now 12 and the namesake of Doug's grandfather, visited their relatives in Moscow, seeing the sights and getting to know their cousins.

Between Boris, who speaks English, and Misha's niece, an English teacher and translator, they were able to communicate. Doug also used the Yiddish he had learned at Montreal's Jewish People's Schools and Peretz Schools to talk to 73-year-old Misha, a mechanical engineer like Arthur and the patriarch of the Russian branch of the family.

Misha's father, Velvel, who died in 1987 at age 86, had asked him to find the Canadian relatives. "It was very important to him, and to me," Misha said.

Boris, a student, recalls being skeptical himself when he originally heard about the Canadian relatives. He thought it couldn't be true, and even if it were, that it wouldn't be possible to reconnect because of the amount of time that had passed and the distant family relationship.

Doug had been curious for a long time about the family his grandfather had left behind in Russia, but he hadn't undertaken a serious search for them. (He has since been inspired to do more research, and found archival documents related to his grandparents' immigration at the Toronto Public Library.)

Although Doug believed that the Russian Strelchiks were in fact his relatives – the information he had about his family history and names of ancestors matched – a photo that Boris e-mailed of Misha's father was "the clincher," said Doug. "It was like one face. My grandfather was 10 years older [than Misha's father], but they were like twins. My father said, 'It's obviously Zaidy's brother.' "

The reunion last summer, and the two seders here – one in Toronto, and one at the home of Doug's sister, Melanie Fisher, in Montreal – mark "a whole new chapter" in the Strelshik family, he said.

The path to spirituality and identity

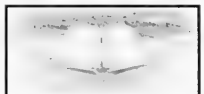
By RABBI MARTIN J. BERMAN

We will read in the Torah this Shabbat (Leviticus, 14:4): "The Lord spoke to Moses, saying: Speak to the Israelite people and say to them 'I the Lord am your God. You shall not copy the practices of the land of Egypt where you dwelt, or of the land of Canaan to which I am taking you; nor shall you follow their laws. My rules alone shall you observe, and faithfully follow My laws. I the Lord am your God.'"



It's clear from the context that the Torah is warning the Children of Israel to observe the various laws that are enumerated immediately after this passage. These laws mostly deal with various sexual practices, what are called incest taboos.

The rabbis saw an even wider message in this passage. They said that the passage, "My rules alone shall you observe, and faithfully follow My laws," emphasizes that the Jews must obey the Torah, whether the law be rational ethical rules or merely ritual rules with no grounding in reason.

This dichotomy of mishpat, rational ethical law, and chok, non-rational ritual law, has often been a subject of study and dispute.

Rashi defines the two types of laws this way: mishpatim are rules given in the Torah that people would have created even if they had not been given – for example, the law against murder. A chok, on the other hand, is simply a decree of the King – for example, the ban on eating pork.

Maimonides rejects this idea of a chok being the non-rational decree of a king. He believed that every law of the Torah has a rational basis that can be discovered. As such, he came up with the unfortunate interpretation that the ban on eating pork is meant as a health measure. While I usually side with Maimonides' rationalism, here I prefer Rashi. For we cannot always see the rational basis of a law of the Torah. And while we can assume that the overall nature of the Torah is to make us better people, the individual commands may not always have a specific individual goal in mind.

But many people today only hear half of what Maimonides was saying. They assume everything must be rational and will only observe those mitzvot for which they can derive a rational underpinning. They understand the need for an ethical code, although in today's world, people don't feel constrained to follow the ethical code of the Torah.

But you can make a case for ethics. It's in the area of chukim that the greatest challenge resides. There seem to be no valid reasons to observe chukim.

The traditional community has never denied the validity of ritual, never given up on the chok, but too many people who belong to traditionally minded synagogues gave up on them in their daily lives. Shabbat, kashrut and prayer have been relegated to the synagogue, not to the everyday world outside the confines of the shul.

There are two important reasons for us to remember and stress rituals.

First, chukim represent the unknowable, the mystical element in the world. Rituals carry us beyond the knowable world to the divine. As I wrote this, my radio was playing classical music. I love the ebb and flow of the music. The sounds wash over me and transport me to another place. Ritual is a kind of music that can reach even deeper. It can hit you right in the soul, lifting you up, taking you to a plane where you confront the unknowable, the ayn sof of the mystics.

We are rational beings, and Judaism is rightly saluted for its emphasis on the rational, but sometimes we need to go beyond the purely rational into the domain of the mystical. In Jewish tradition, we have that capability when the ritual speaks to the heart and not the mind, such as when the recitation of the prayers or the lighting of the Shabbat candles – that is, the concentration on the power of the act – can carry you to God.

Secondly, chukim give us our identity as Jews. While there are certainly important differences between Judaism and Christianity, we share much of our moral and ethical sensibilities with Christians. If Rashi is correct – that mishpatim are laws that had not God given them, we would have created them for ourselves – they should be the inheritance of all rational beings. It's our ritual that sets us apart and defines us as being Jewish. Laws against murdering and stealing are not limited to Jews. It's the way we eat, the way we pray and the way we address the unknowable that sets us apart.

The Torah warns that we must obey so that "the land vomit not you out also." If we don't observe the Torah, but instead copy the ways of the people around us, we will not be vomited out by the land. Instead we will be swallowed up, lose our identity and disappear from the face of the earth.

Lag b'Omer: a lesson in unity

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In the later part of counting the Omer is the holiday of Lag b'Omer. The 33rd day of counting is a holiday that commemorates an occurrence of persecution and freedom of one of the ancient sages, Shimon bar Yochai. According to the Talmud, Rabbi Shimon was sitting with several colleagues and discussing the merits and dangers of the Roman Empire. While others were pointing out possible contributions by the Romans, Rabbi Shimon was adamant in dismissing and disparaging any of the higher infrastructure or contributions they brought to the region.

Among those listening to this rabbinic discussion is an informer who tells the Romans about Rabbi Shimon's comments. A death sentence is pronounced, which forces Rabbi Shimon and his son to go into hiding. They hide in a cave for 12 years, during which time, tradition tells us, Rabbi Shimon is compiling and writing Jewish Kabbalistic literature. When Caesar dies, it becomes safe to emerge from the cave, and Rabbi Shimon and his son re-enter the world.

Upon encountering society again, Rabbi Shimon is unable to process what he sees. There are people working in the fields and engaging in everyday necessities to keep the economy running and their society strong. Rabbi Shimon is appalled at the time wasted that could have been devoted to Torah. Using the mystical powers he has strengthened for 12 years, Rabbi Shimon proceeds to set afire everything he gazes upon.

God intervenes and sends Rabbi Shimon back to his cave for one more year. God chastises Rabbi Shimon by proclaiming: "Have you come out to destroy My world?" After the 13th year, Rabbi Shimon and his son again re-enter society, this time with a different attitude. Rabbi Shimon sees that even the daily occurrences of the average person are an expression of God's presence in the world.

At times, we focus on the details and lose sight of the larger picture. Our focus can lead us to lash out in ways that are destructive to Jewish goals and our Jewish unity. We are Rabbi Shimon when he first emerges from the cave, and with all good intentions we destroy what should be valued.

With patience, introspection and Jewish creativity, further reflection and study of the Torah allows us to keep focused on the larger issues. It's easy to introduce divisive elements within a community that is rich in Jewish expression. Rabbi Shimon was not wrong in his initial observations. He was simply exercising his observations inappropriately. He is correct in concluding that time we spend elsewhere could be spent on Torah. He is correct in noticing that the Torah, in all its details and insights, could become the world in itself. He is incorrect in not seeing that the Torah was meant to function within a world and within a Jewish community. The last year spent in the cave serves to introduce perspective and to refocus Rabbi Shimon on the larger goals at stake.

The study of Torah is a skill that invites diverse opinions and debate to enrich all of our understandings. The expressions of a Jewish community must find a way to promote a unified and strong community. The beauty of Torah as a functioning document is that it affords scope and latitude for all Jews to find themselves. The duty of a Jewish community is to preserve unity when we gather while securing diversity when we debate.

Rabbi Shimon emerged from his cave on Lag b'Omer. It would be a fitting time for all Jewish communities to remember that Torah is not only about study and the expression of detail, but equally about finding its way into the daily and valid expressions of a unified Jewish community.

Winnipeg Chabad unveils plans for $3-million shul, yeshiva

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Chabad Lubavitch of Winnipeg's longtime dream of building a yeshiva in this city is a step closer to reality.

In mid-April, Chabad spokesperson Rabbi Yaacov Simmonds unveiled plans for an ambitious $3-million Lubavitch centre in south Winnipeg that would include a synagogue, social hall, auditorium, library, lounge, classrooms, kosher kitchen, parking lot for 60 cars and a play area.

Rabbi Avraham Altein bought the Lubavitch movement to Winnipeg in the early 1970s. Chabad has a building in a residential area of north Winnipeg that serves as a synagogue, school and auditorium.

About five years ago, after witnessing the movement of the majority of Winnipeg's Jewish population to the south end of the city, Chabad leased a storefront to better serve the burgeoning number of Jewish residents in south Winnipeg.

At the same time, Chabad began looking for property on which to build a permanent centre in south Winnipeg. It found the property it wanted two years ago and was able to finalize the purchase arrangements last fall.

Centre to be built in phases

Rabbi Simmonds said the centre will be built in phases as funding permits. The first phase, which he estimates will cost $1 million, will consist of space for a day care, youth programs and adult education classes. For the past nine years, Chabad has been holding a summer yeshiva program, which features visiting rabbinical students who lead five weeks for study with interested members of the community.

The rabbi said that if funding and everything else falls into place on time, phase I construction could begin by summer's end. If not, then the work will begin next spring. The social hall, synagogue, library, lounge, classrooms and kitchen will be built as funding permits.

"This is an opportunity to put Winnipeg on the Jewish map," an enthusiastic Rabbi Simmonds said.

He notes that Lubavitch doesn't have an official membership. Even on the High Holy Days, both the north and south Winnipeg Chabad centres are open to anyone who wants to attend services.

But Rabbi Simmonds estimates that Lubavitch comes in contact with as many as 5,000 Jewish Winnipeggers a year through its outreach programs in Jewish schools and the community.

He said Chabad will be holding a kosher fundraising dinner this month at the Hotel Fort Garry, one of Winnipeg's oldest and classiest hotels, to raise money for the Winnipeg south project.

Jewish names, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we looked at the significance of Jewish names. Today, we look at choosing one. If you happen to be in the market for a name – or if you want to lend some advice to someone who is – there is a wealth of suggestions waiting for you on the web.

Of course, many Ashkenazim start their quest by considering naming after a family member. Rabbi Paysach Krohn quotes one of the founders of Chassidut in Galicia, Poland, Rabbi Elimelech of Lyzhansk, who said that there is a profound connection between the soul of an infant and the soul of the person for whom he or she is named. "When a child is named after the deceased, the latter's soul is elevated to a higher realm in heaven and a spiritual connection is created between the soul of the departed and the soul of the newborn child. That deep spiritual bond between these two souls can have a profound impact on the child." [http://tinyurl.com/ndy9e]

Although Sephardim may honour a living family member by naming a child after them, Ashkenazi Jews do not follow the same practice. As the Ritual Reality website explains, "They rarely name children after living relatives, probably dating from a superstition of the Middle Ages to avoid having the Angel of Death take the newborn child instead of the aging relative it was named for by mistake." [http://tinyurl.com/pwh7b]

And then there is the Bible. As Lisa Katz points out, there are about 2,800 names mentioned in the Bible but only about five per cent of those names are used today. (Think of how many Abraham's and Esther's and you've met compared to of Arpachshad's and Maacah's. [http://tinyurl.com/qf892]

Aside from relatives and the Bible, there is no shortage of other places to look. Tempe, Arizona's Tri-City JCC site lists the major sources including holidays, animals and plants, Israeli place names, Jewish celebrities and historical figures. [http://tinyurl.com/odz32]

There are several excellent sites where you can look up names. Babynamer.com isn't a Jewish site, but it does index more than 500 Hebrew names. You can even specify the first letter of the name and how many syllables you are looking for. With most names, you are given a definition. For example, Aviva means "Springtime" and Liora is "God's gift of light to me." [http://tinyurl.com/kxmze]

If you're still stuck for a name, check out Cantor Philip L. Sherman's Jewish Naming Guide [http://tinyurl.com/lg42h], Baby NameWorld [www.babynameworld.com/biblical.asp], JewishBabyNames [http://tinyurl.com/f63qo] and the Hebrew site, Zooloo. [www.zooloo.co.il/more/name/]

Meanwhile, AskMoses answers some interesting name-related questions, such as is it proper to name two siblings after the same grandparent? (same name, no; same letter, yes). [http://tinyurl.com/fzt2a] And of course, Jewish names aren't just for newborns. Anita Diamant has advice for converts who want to choose the right name. [http://tinyurl.com/n37rx]

When selecting a name, parents are always walking a tightrope between choosing a unique moniker and one that's become too popular. The U.S. Social Security Administration keeps tracks of baby-naming trends, so that you can check the popularity of the top 1,000 names going back to 1900. In 2004, there were 323 "Chaya's" born, which placed the name in 783rd place, and 173 "Chaim's," which put the name in 953rd place. (Emily and Jacob have been number one since 1999.) [www.ssa.gov/OACT/babynames/]

I want to finish with a story that Rabbi Berel Wein tells. It's about a brit milah that a friend of his attended. When the rabbi asked the father what he was going to name the newborn boy, the father responded, "Avraham, Yitzchok, Yakov, David, Shlomo, Yosef."

The rabbi was astounded and asked the father, "Why such a string of names?"

The father replied, "Rabbi, I am a poor man, so the child won't have much of an inheritance.

"If he resembles my wife's side of the family, he probably won't be that smart.

"And if he looks like my side of the family, he is not going to be too handsome, either.

"So, I decided, let him at least have a good name!"

Toronto students join Darfur rally in D.C.

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

As hundreds of people gathered in Toronto for last week's Scream for Darfur rally at Queen's Park, a few Jewish Torontonians were on their way to the simultaneous rally in Washington, D.C. to ensure their presence was felt there as well.

Aviva Zimmerman, 21, a fourth-year theatre student at Ryerson University was one of four people – three students and a Hillel of Greater Toronto staff – who made the overnight drive to the National Mall in Washington, D.C. to represent Toronto at a rally aimed at raising awareness about the genocide in Darfur and to push the government into action.

"It was a whirlwind trip, but it was really powerful," Zimmerman said.

"I learned a lot about the Darfur conflict. I had already known a little bit about the issue, but this really opened my eyes to a lot more."

Zimmerman guessed that more students didn't come because the rally was held in the middle of exam season, and some may have opted to show their support at the Toronto rally instead.

"It was important to add numbers to the cause because it is so horrific what is going on there," she said.

Tilly Shames, the Israel affairs director at Hillel of Greater Toronto, led the three students on their overnight trek to meet with members of Cornell Hillel in Ithaca, N.Y., at 5 a.m. before making their way to the National Mall, where the rally was staged.

The rally was just one of many organized in cities across North America that urged the government to help end the killing, raping and torturing of hundreds of thousands of Sudanese people at the hands of an Arab militia group known as the janjaweed.

Since the conflict began three years ago, it is estimated that more than 400,000 people have been murdered and about 2.5 million have been displaced from their homes.

"The two major messages were 'not on our watch' and 'never again.' These were the slogans that were seen on signs throughout," Shames said.

Among the speakers were Rabbi David Saperstein, director of the Washington-based Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism; Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel; the New York City-based civil rights activist Rev. Al Sharpton; U.S. Senator Barack Obama; actor George Clooney; and Paul Rusesabagina, who inspired the film Hotel Rwanda.

"It felt good to be part of such a large mass of people that were raising awareness about the issue," Shames said, adding that there was a real sense of non-partisanship among the estimated 15,000 protesters and that people were supporting the cause regardless of their political affiliations.

She criticized the Canadian government for failing to call the conflict in Darfur a genocide, even though the United States has done so. She added that it seems that the United States is more willing to do something about it.

"It is imperative for us not to be silent," Shames said.

Zimmerman said one message that really stood out was that the conflict in Darfur is just one of many conflicts in Africa.

"It is important to draw attention to this, but we should also be aware of what is happening in the Congo and Uganda. It's important to stand up for them too," she said.

After watching a video provided by the Cornell Hillel leader on the bus on the way to the rally, Zimmerman said it opened her eyes to the atrocities in the region.

Laura Blumenfeld

In 1986, Laura Blumenfeld's father was shot in Jerusalem by a member of a rebel faction of the PLO responsible for attacks on several tourists in the Old City. Her father lived, but Blumenfeld's desire for revenge haunted her. Revenge: A Story of Hope is her story. A rare, ambitious, personal, and intellectual tour of dark urges often denied, Revenge: A Story of Hope is a beautifully written story about family, loyalty, and home, about the personal passions behind public events, and about the thin line between love and hate.

Students hear from Wiesel at Washington rally

"The video was a detailed account of what is going on there. It brought it home for me and it helped me realize the extent of the human suffering."

Zimmerman added that the highlight of the rally was being with 1,000 other Jewish students, and that she was glad for the opportunity to "get connected and get engaged with student activism.

"This was an awesome experience and I'm very appreciative that Hillel was able to subsidize the trip. They really try to reach out to students and help them get connected to the rest of the world," she said, adding that the transportation to Washington only cost her $40.

For Shames, the most memorable parts of the rally came from the many parallels that were drawn to the Holocaust.

"Elie Wiesel was certainly a highlight. It was powerful to hear from him, as well as [California Congressman Tom] Lantos, who are both Holocaust survivors. To hear them speak about Darfur was really powerful," she said.

"We were all so glad we made the effort to go down to Washington for this rally. Sadly, the Jewish people experienced what it was like for others to remain silent during our time of need. We will not remain silent now and allow another genocide to continue."

Sane or crazy? How to handle Iran

As Iran defies the UN Security Council by pressing ahead with its nuclear ambitions, analysts and media commentators generally agree that it must not be allowed to acquire nuclear weapons. But they agree on little else.

The Globe and Mail editorial "Keep after Iran," April 29, calls for international sanctions: "Only tough, concerted action by the international community will put an end to Iran's reckless game of [nuclear] brinkmanship."

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

The Globe notes that Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme religious leader and head of its nuclear program, said Tehran might transfer nuclear technology and expertise to Sudan, "confirming one of the West's worst fears. If Iran manages to become a nuclear power, it could well become a storehouse of scientific knowledge and technology that would be made available to unstable Islamic regimes and perhaps to terrorist groups themselves."

And because "Tehran has been unwilling to engage in the normal give-and-take that makes negotiation and compromise possible," sanctions are the best solution, the paper argues. "A genuine threat of effective economic sanctions, which would severely damage Iran's oil-reliant economy and a freeze on its foreign assets, which would hit the ruling elite in the pocketbook."

The editorial concludes: "If there is one thing some of Iran's leading mullahs fear almost as much as an open, democratic society, it is a disruption of their lucrative business activity."

However, economic powerhouses Russia and China are threatening to veto any UN Security Council resolutions that would impose mandatory economic sanctions. Russia has made massive investments in Iran, including $1 billion in the Bushehr nuclear plant alone. China also has multibillion dollar contracts for crude oil and gas needed to fuel its rapidly expanding economy.

Even the European countries – some of which, like Germany, are major trading partners with Iran – are not united on sanctions. The Reuters report, "Iran consensus in focus on Merkel U.S. trip," May 3, notes that German Chancellor Angela Merkel, heading for a meeting with U.S. President George W. Bush, "wants to keep [UN Security] Council members Russia and China, which oppose sanctions, onside and German officials say she will try to convince Bush of the need for a measured step-by-step approach toward Iran that preserves the fragile western front."

In the meantime, analysts don't agree if Iran's leaders, and especially President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, are even rational actors capable of being stopped by, if not sanctions, then the threat of nuclear deterrence.

In "Deterrent Defeat" (New Republic, May 8), Peter Beinart argues that if nuclear deterrence can work against North Korea, "as isolated and nutty a state as exists on the face of the earth," it should work against Iran. "Where's the evidence that [Iran's leaders] seek martyrdom so fervently that they would risk the one thing that most regimes value above all else: survival?"

Beinart's view is shared by Janice Stein, director of the Munk Centre for International Studies, University of Toronto. On Diplomatic Immunity (TVO, April 29), Stein appeared to surprise host Steve Paikin, who had questioned whether the Iranian regime is rational, by saying: "Do we know that Ahmadinejad is mad? I don't think we do… I think we know we profoundly disagree with virtually everything he says… but I'm not sure he's crazy."

Former U.S. Mideast peace envoy Dennis Ross takes a different view in "A New Strategy on Iran" (Washington Post, May 1): "As for those who think that the nuclear deterrent rules that governed relations between the United States and the Soviet Union during the Cold War will also apply in a nuclear Middle East: don't be so confident… [W]ith an Iranian president who sees himself as an instrument for accelerating the coming of the 12th Imam – which is preceded in the mythology by the equivalent of Armageddon – one should not take comfort in thinking that Iran will act responsibly."

Jewish studies association holds conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Association for Canadian Jewish Studies (ACJS), an organization with about 150 members in Canada and a few in the United States and Israel, is offering an eclectic mix of subjects for its upcoming three-day annual conference.

"I think it's a tremendous achievement that we have over 30 scholarly papers," said AJCS president Randal Schnoor, a York University sociologist. Canadian Jewish studies is a small but growing field, he noted.

"I'm very excited about the conference because it's our 30th anniversary and it's one of our largest conferences," he said.

The event will kick off Sunday, May 28, at Beth Sholom Synagogue with a day-long "Festival of Canadian Jewish Life and Culture" that is open to the public.

Keynote speaker Morton Weinfeld, a McGill University sociologist and author of Like Everyone Else, but Different: The Paradoxical Success of Canadian Jews, will discuss "The shift from Canadian anti-Semitism to anti-Semitism in Canada," at an evening session.

Daytime sessions will include "Portraits of Jewish Scholars and Rabbis in Montreal"; "Israel and the Mediation of Diaspora Identity," which will feature a speaker on "Campus Zionism and the Embattled Jew"; "Sephardic Canadian Jewry"; and "The Commemoration of Canadian Jewish War Veterans."

The evening will include a dessert reception in honour of the organization's 30th anniversary, and presentation of a distinguished service award to historian Gerald Tulchinsky of Queen's University. York University history professor Irving Abella will receive the same award two nights later.

The other two days of the conference are part of a larger meeting called the Congress of the Humanities and Social Sciences, held every year at a different university, said Schnoor.

The AJCS conference will include a joint session with the Society for Italian Studies and the Association for Canadian Hispanists that will examine identities among the Italian, Spanish and Jewish communities in Canada.

"I think it will be a very dynamic session," said Schnoor, who is also a presenter (along with Dan Mendelssohn Aviv of Bialik Hebrew Day School and Jack Lipinsky of United Synagogue Day School and the University of Toronto), at a session on "The Jewish Day School in Canada."

The conference will wind up with a dinner, a klezmer concert and a panel on "The Futures of Yiddish Education and Culture in Canada." The event is open to the public for a cost of $10.

Global Partners in Cancer Research

Women of Action Luncheon 2006

The 5th Annual Women of Action Luncheon took place on April 5, 2006. This year ICRF was privileged to honour four exceptional women: Sandra Ainsley, visionary art dealer; Lesley Binstock Offman, outstanding community leader; Dr. Janet Rossant, Chief of Research at The Hospital for Sick Children and Keynote Speaker, Margaret Wente of the Globe & Mail.

Honourees Sandra Ainsley and Lesley Binstock Offman both had very personal reasons for accepting their invitations. They had lost their husbands to the disease and were compelled to do whatever they could to help support cancer research.

"I just couldn't say no," says Lesley. "ICRF is doing wonderful work in supporting some of the world's best and brightest research scientists in the battle against cancer." Lesley's sentiments were echoed by Sandra who added that she was "very honoured" when asked to be recognized at the event and that she "wants to support the major breakthroughs in cancer research coming out of Israel."

Over 500 people attended this tremendous event, thanks in part to our ambitious committee. Many new, enthusiastic young leaders were involved in this year's event.

Our First Mission to Israel

Last November ICRF (Toronto) joined forces with State of Israel Bonds Women's Division for our first Mission to Israel. Mission participants met two brilliant ICRF scientists, Dr. Howard Cedar (Hadassah Hospital), a recipient of The Israeli Prize in Biology, and Dr. Alberto Gabizon (Shaarei Tzedek Hospital) who developed the breakthrough drug Doxil, used in the treatment of ovarian and breast cancers.

As supporters of ICRF, this group was grateful to know these extraordinary scientists are indeed making a difference. The tours of the Hadassah Hospital and the Shaarei Tzedek Hospital were fascinating. "What touched me most was the deep sense of caring and commitment found in all the hospitals we visited where special care is given to the whole person," recalls Mission participant Gale Borison-Socken. The sights, sounds and tastes of Israel were ever present during this remarkable journey.

ICRF is looking forward to leading another exciting mission to Israel November 5 -13, 2006. For information or to pre-register, contact Karen Lieberman at the ICRF office at 416-440-7781 or via e-mail Karen.Lieberman@icrfonline.org

Our Scientists - Trailblazing Towards A Cure

Doctors Avram Hershko and Aaron Ciechanover of the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology were awarded the 2004 Nobel Prize for Chemistry for their discovery of the ubiquitin system, a method of removing the body's damaged proteins. Their research resulted in the development of the drug Velcade named the "Top Medical Breakthrough of 2003" by the wall Street Journal. Velcade is used to treat multiple myeloma and is being used in over 50 countries worldwide.

Dr. Eli Canaani of the Weizmann Institute of Science identified the first abnormal chromosome found in Leukemia, leading to a new drug GLEEVEC, which is the first-ever approved cancer-specific drug and has been shown to treat Leukemia patients with high success rates. It is currently being tested on other cancers. "Gleevec helped launch what oncologists hope will be an effective strategy for staunching tumors and prolonging survival of cancer patients with fewer side effects than those that accompany conventional chemotherapy," The Wall Street Journal reported on January 27.

Dr. Alberto Gabizon of Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Hospital developed a new formulation of a chemo-therapeutic drug, DOXIL, used to treat breast and ovarian cancer as well as a form of cancer in AIDS patients.

Dr. Howard Cedar of Hebrew University, Hadassah is acknowledged as a pioneer for his extraordinary achievements in understanding the processes of gene regulation, expression, and DNA replication. He was awarded the Israel Prize in Biology, in 1999 by the State of Israel.

ICRF Origins

In 1975 ICRF was founded by a group of doctors who came to the conclusion that not only was Israel in the forefront of cancer research, but it was also a world leader in cost effective research facilities. Also, Israel had a network of well equipped laboratories, superb scientists and a unified healthcare system. ICRF has raised over US $31 million and has awarded 1,526 grants to scientists in 25 institutions throughout Israel. Their discoveries are being used by patients worldwide.

Monies raised at ICRF events and other initiatives such as our holiday and tribute cards, provide fellowships to leading physicians and scientists enabling them to continue their promising research and to pursue new initiatives in finding cures for cancer.

Celebration Delivers

When ICRF volunteers say they will throw a party, they deliver "big time". Celebration of Hope 2005, one of ICRF's most anticipated events of the year, was a great success! Last November, over 300 guests enjoyed outstanding music and live entertainment by the Magen Boys, a fabulous silent and live auction, and a poker tournament sponsored by Casino Media Group in support of cancer research.

Co-chairs Lisa Erlick, Faith Sherman, and Jennifer Gold

Co-Chairs Lisa Erlick, Faith Sherman and Jennifer Gold have each been touched by cancer at some level and are passionate about eradicating the disease. Sadly, Lisa's son is dealing with the effects of cancer at the young age of 11. He was diagnosed with a brain tumor and has been receiving cancer treatments for the past year. Thankfully, he is on his way to recovery. "I was involved with ICRF and previous ICRF events for several years before Evan's diagnosis," says Lisa. "Once the diagnosis was made I knew I had to stay involved. Evan sees that the whole family is working to help scientists in Israel find a cure and feels very good about that."

"Celebration was a terrific opportunity for friends and new friends to get together to support a really great cause and to have a fantastic time," says event co-chair Faith Sherman. "People kept coming up to me all night to say this was the best time they ever had at a fundraising event."

Junior Partners in the Fight Against Cancer

Just as cancer knows no age restrictions, there are no age restrictions for the volunteers who work for ICRF. Our supporters believe that youth should grow up with an understanding of the disease and how they too can play a part in supporting research. The Tzedakah Project is an outreach program in partnership with the USDS Bathurst campus that bring scientists into the classroom to encourage students to support ICRF. It is currently being expanded to include students at other Hebrew day schools.

A Bar and Bat Mitzvah program has also been created for young people to give a portion of their gifts to ICRF. The response from our 'junior partners' has been very rewarding. Their gifts are from the heart and often honouring loved ones who have been touched by cancer. "Unfortunately many of today's young people are all too familiar with this dreaded disease," says Janice Jordan, one the volunteers spearheading ICRF youth programs. "It is rewarding to educate the community's youth on how they can contribute to finding a cure."

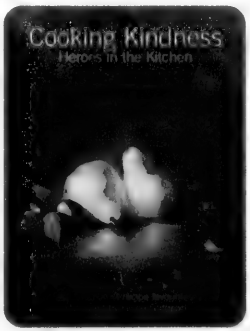
A multitude of thanks to our young donors who have generously supported ICRF.

Cooking Kindness - Heroes in the Kitchen

Author/broadcaster Gloria Guttman has been greatly involved with ICRF for 13 years. She has put her heart and soul into her new cookbook, Cooking Kindness - Heroes in the Kitchen. Proceeds will be donated to ICRF (Toronto).



Launch of a new cookbook by Glona Guttman

Cooking Kindness includes a compilation of Gloria's favourite recipes plus those she has collected from around the world over the past decades. Many of the contributors have dedicated their recipes in honour of a cancer victim or survivor. "I wanted to do something that combines my passion for friends, family and food," says Gloria. "Cooking Kindness does this in a way that also supports the fantastic work being undertaken by the brilliant researchers in Israel."

Launched at the 2006 Women of Action Luncheon, Cooking Kindness - Heroes inthe Kitchen will soon be widely available at book stores, fine food shops and synagogues. To order your copy, please call 1-866-230-3269 or visit gguttman04@earthlink.net.

Students voice enthusiasm for Israel at birthday rally

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — This year, it was mostly for the kids.

About 2,000 boisterous, festive Jewish day and high school students – and some 1,000 others – crowded into Pierre Elliott Trudeau Park's Butler Building in Cote St. Luc to cheer Israel on its 58th birthday last week.

For the past four years, the Jewish community has staged a massive pro-Israel march and rally in downtown Montreal on Yom Ha'atzmaut. The event was deliberately scaled down this year, compared with the tens of thousands who gathered downtown for the earlier events.

The decision by FEDERATION CJA to shift the rally to the Jewish community's "centre of town" to make it easier for students to participate also seemed to make it a more intimate and down-home experience for the young ralliers despite the steady drizzle.

Still, opinion was divided on the move. Two veterans of the downtown rallies – École Maimonide's Daniel Rossdutscher, 15, and Bialik High School's Katie Cohen Olidenstein, 14 – told The CJN they would have preferred the usual venue because it allowed the general public to see the depth of Jewish community support for Israel.

"It's safer here," Olidenstein said, "but better downtown, because more people see how much we appreciate Israel."

But neither that point of view nor the rain appeared to dampen the overall spirit if the noise in the building was any indicator.

Gone from the program were the lengthy speeches of the downtown event. In its place were students from Jewish schools standing on stage to sing their hearts out and show their fellowship with and knowledge of specific parts of Israel.

Israel's 'Bob Dylan' performs on Yom Ha'atzmaut

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The Jewish community here celebrated Israel's 58th birthday with Israeli composer, songwriter and singer Hanan Yovel, last week.

"Hanan Yovel is like the Bob Dylan of Israel," said Michal Solomon, a Winnipeg resident who was born in Israel. "We all grew up with his songs. Actually, everyone knows his songs, and he is a reflection of the kind of warm-hearted society Israel is."

Yovel, who has produced more than 20 popular albums, performed many of his hit songs, as well as traditional favourites, including Yerushalayim Shel Zahav. It was a one-man show, with Yovel singing and playing guitar. He sang most of the tunes in Hebrew, with some English verses sprinkled in.

Born in Kibbutz Mishmarot, Yovel served in the Israeli military in the musical Nahal troupe. He then became a member of the Shlosharim Trio, a band that introduced elements of rock to the Israeli pop music scene. Since then, he has had a successful solo career.

The evening began with a falafel dinner served in the gym, and after the concert, guests were given cake in honour of the State of Israel's birthday.

The audience of about 500 showed their pride for Israel, many singing along and clapping to Yovel's songs, some dancing at the foot of the stage, while children danced and waved Israeli flags.

The children primarily enjoyed the music, the food and and the celebratory mood, while the teens, adults and seniors also appreciated the opportunity to be at an event with an Israeli flavour.

Israel less secure than ever despite strength, prof argues

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Although Israel has a stronger military and economy than ever before, it faces a security paradox that leaves it little room to manoeuvre, a leading Israeli academic says.

"Never before in the history of Israel has [the country] been so powerful militarily and economically, and yet, never has it been so insecure," University of Toronto political science professor Emanuel Adler, the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Chair in Israeli Studies, said at a recent lecture at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

"Unfortunately, the situation is damned if you do, damned if you don't."

Any solution to the quagmire, the international relations theorist argued, must be political.

"We need a new doctrine to deal with this problem," he related.

"And there is no magic, technical solution. The only way to disarm [Israel's enemies] is to disarm their intention… So the only way to solve the problem… will be political."

In describing the security paradox, Adler illustrated how being strong militarily can work to Israel's disadvantage.

For example, "when we use force, it elicits a response" that, in turn, triggers a "terrorist trap," or endless cycle.

With respect to economic progress, the professor said that Israel is dependent on the United States, which frequently strains its ability to "act on its free will."

The four biggest threats to Israel's security today, said Adler, are terrorism, missiles, demographic concerns and the danger Iran poses if armed with a nuclear weapon or weapons of mass destruction.

"Israelis are surrounded from the north, east and southwest… mainly by religious, fundamentalist groups," he said.

"Using force against them, in most cases, will achieve the opposite [of the desired] result."

In terms of missiles, Adler noted that some long-range ones in the possession of Israel's enemies have a range of 2,000 kilometres and can knock Israeli planes and missiles right out of the sky.

Moreover, if missiles are armed with biological agents, they could inflict catastrophic damage and suffering.

The demographic pressures that Israel is grappling with centre on the likelihood that in the next few years, there will probably be more Arabs than Jews in the area between the Jordan River and Mediterranean Sea.

"The only alternative for this is a two-state solution when a Palestinian state is viable," Adler said.

Perhaps the most daunting threat of all is that posed by Iran and its efforts to achieve nuclear capabilities.

Most daunting threat posed by Iran, Adler says

"In a few years, Iran may have plutonium and enriching capacity," Adler said.

"Once this happens, Israeli intelligence says that in three to four years, Iran will have a nuclear weapon."

What's more, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmedinejad threats to wipe out Israel and the fact that many Iranians are being imbued with a call to martyrdom are tangible reasons why Iran's nuclear ambitions should be taken very seriously, Adler said.

So what is a possible solution to the Iranian nuclear crisis?

Adler said neither diplomacy, a regime change, deterrence, a surgical strike on nuclear sites nor an invasion would be successful.

The one option that may at least stymie Iran for the time being would be for Israel to become a member of NATO, he said.

"Israel would have a nuclear umbrella via NATO," Adler said.

"This process should lead to some kind of… long-term truce in which you get to a solution."

Adler conceded this option has many holes in it, "but if diplomacy fails… I advise the decision-makers to think seriously about this alternative."

Students celebrate in Montreal

"Today is the proof that the Zionist dream is alive and well!" declared Bialik High School student Corey Omer, who served as MC for the event with Sara Villani, also a Bialik student. "Today, Jewish people throughout the Diaspora can come together and rejoice."

Omer's sentiment was echoed by Israeli Consul General Marc Attali, CSL Mayor Anthony Housefather and FEDERATION CJA vice-president Jack Hasen, the only other speakers on the program.

Attali delivered a Yom Ha'atzmaut message from Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert, and Housefather cited Israel as a "beacon of light" in the Middle East.

"As Canadians we have to proudly proclaim our support of Israel every day of the year," Housefather said.

"All CSLers have a special connection to Israel," including Ashkelon being the municipality's twin city, he added.

Hasen noted the level of enthusiasm being transmitted by the younger crowd.

Despite its friendly location, the rally, co-chaired by federation volunteers Brenda Gewurz and Gary Lackstein, was marked by an extraordinarily high level of security, with dozens of police from CSL and neighbouring municipalities virtually blanketing the area by car and on foot.

Rabbi urges fight against high intermarriage rates

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Rabbi Henry Balser, spiritual leader of Winnipeg's Etz Chayim Congregation, has issued a clarion call for action in light of a new report that shows high intermarriage rates among young Jewish Winnipeggers.

Quoting from a report based on 2001 census data – prepared by Charles Shahar, the Montreal-based head demographer for UIA Federations Canada – Rabbi Balser noted in a letter to Winnipeg's Jewish Post and News that 62.5 per cent of married Jewish Winnipeggers under 30 have spouses who aren't Jewish, compared to 39 per cent of married Jewish Winnipeggers between 30 and 39 and 20 per cent for those over 39.

Overall, Winnipeg's intermarriage rate of 23 per cent is higher than those of Montreal (13 per cent) and Toronto (15.6 per cent), but lower than those of Ottawa (almost 32 per cent), Calgary (34 per cent) and Vancouver (41 per cent).

The corollary to these intermarriage rates is that about one-third of Winnipeg's Jewish children are growing up in multifaith homes. Of 2,210 children 14 and under identified as Jewish in the 2001 census, 35 per cent live in mixed-marriage households. Twenty-three per cent of children aged 15 to 24 were living in mixed-marriage homes.

In his letter to the Post, Rabbi Balser – whose Conservative, 700-member congregation is Winnipeg's second largest shul – recognizes that fulminating against intermarriage from his pulpit is futile.

"Our children will fall in love with whomever they choose," he wrote. "Given the open society we live in and the not very Jewish lives they lead, the people they love will increasingly be non-Jews."

He argues that secular or cultural Judaism is a dead end. "Only a religious Judaism gives a reason for Jewish continuity and gives young people the idea that being Jewish is really important," he said.

Nor does he believe that teaching Hebrew or Yiddish as an end in itself will do anything to preserve Jewish identity. He calls on the Jewish community leaders to put more resources into programs that will give Jews "the knowledge and enthusiasm that will enable them to have truly Jewish homes and lead Jewish lives."

He also stresses the centrality of the synagogue and a belief in God.

The study also found that Jews with non-Jewish spouses are more likely to live in neighbourhoods that have not traditionally been Jewish areas. Winnipeg's most heavily Jewish neighbourhoods – such as South River Heights and Tuxedo in south Winnipeg and Garden City in north Winnipeg – have intermarriage rates of around 10 per cent.

Downtown and in the nearby Wolseley area (popularly known as the "granola belt"), the intermarriage rate is 44 per cent. In other areas far from traditional Jewish neighbourhoods, the intermarriage rate is between 73 per cent and 83 per cent.

"We are noticing that younger people are moving into neighbourhoods that are not traditionally Jewish," said Faye Rosenberg-Cohen, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's director of planning, who helped prepare the study.

The report also found that among Argentine Jewish immigrants to Winnipeg over the past few years, the rate of intermarriage is nil. Among Russian Jewish immigrants, intermarriage is at about 33 per cent.

Rosenberg-Cohen observed that since the census data is five years old, the high rate of intermarriage likely applies to people under 35, rather than under 30.

She said the federation is studying the issue and will come up with a strategy to deal with it over the coming months.

Esprit de Corps editor shares Iraq experiences

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Scott Taylor, editor and publisher of the military magazine Esprit de Corps, author, military adviser and former member of the Princess Patricia's Light Infantry of the Canadian armed forces, has been to Iraq more than 22 times.

Taylor covered the war in the Balkans in the 1990s and was invited by Slobodan Milosevic to interview him in his jail cell. "The Balkans [experience] led directly to my other area of expertise – Iraq," Taylor told members and friends of the Ottawa Post of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada at their annual banquet on April 30.

"In 2000 when nobody else was going there, I started. I have now been there 22 times, got to know how the country works and the different factions."

'I was tortured as an accused Mossad spy'

At first, Taylor was reporting on the impact of UN sanctions in Iraq. He later covered the U.S. invasion.

In March 2003, during his last trip prior to the American intervention, Taylor was asked to leave Iraq for fear of his being a spy for the Israeli Mossad.

"I was tortured as an accused Mossad spy. Does that qualify me as an honorary member of the Jewish War Veterans?" he asked with a light touch.

But in referring to his first-hand experience with torture, Taylor admitted that he was terrified. "Yes, indeed, these things do scare the crap out of you… to be accused of being a Mossad spy is not something you want to happen. To be the story rather than get the story was embarrassing. But that experience allowed me to get experience about what is happening inside Iraq."

He is now acting as an adviser to the Americans. "If anyone doubts that the Americans are losing the war in Iraq, the fact that they have a kid from Scarborough briefing them means they are in trouble," he said.

"Last July, with good reason, I went back into Iraq… the reason for going back was a bit of personal peace. In the interim, one of the guys that had beat me had been picked up and I was able to give a witness statement that helped to put him away. It doesn't get any better than that."

Taylor concluded by sharing a lesson he had learned from his father: "Courage is the one virtue without which all the rest are meaningless."

The banquet was also an opportunity to bid farewell and congratulations to Maj.-Gen. Edward Fitch, who is retiring from the Canadian Armed Forces after 38 years of service and will be moving, with his wife Sharon, to Victoria, B.C.

Phil Pinkus, on behalf of the Ottawa Post, announced that a cheque for $500 will be donated to the post's scholarship fund in Fitch's honor.

Fitch thanked the post and said he had spoken to his father that day. His father, also a Jewish war veteran, had reminded him that including his nephew, five consecutive generations of the Fitch family have now served in the military.

Historian's lecture boosts Jewish Heritage Centre's coffers

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

Martin Gilbert in Winnipeg

WINNIPEG — An appearance by famed British Jewish historian Martin Gilbert has added more than $100,000 to the badly depleted coffers of the Winnipeg-based Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada.

Gilbert was the inaugural speaker on April 30 at the centre's new, annual Sol and Florence Kanee Distinguished Lecture series. He spoke about the Jews of Arab lands, drawing extensively from his book on the subject. He concluded that the United Nations is slowly coming around to the view that Jews who fled their Arab homelands are also refugees and suggested that they, too, may one day receive compensation.

Gilbert spoke to an audience of about 600 at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue in an event that gave Winnipeg's financially beleaguered Jewish Heritage Centre (JHC) a vital shot in the arm.

Within the past year, the JHC has had its funding from the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg slashed considerably, while at the same time its rent at the Asper Jewish Community Campus, like all of the campus' tenants, has been doubled.

As a result, the JHC has been forced to move out of the space occupied by the nine-year-old Marion and Ed Vickar Jewish Museum of Western Canada and give up some of its office space.

The JHC executive and its board of directors are adopting a positive attitude about the changes that have been forced upon them.

Rather than having a traditional museum space, after June 30, the JHC will have three wall-mounted displays and one exhibit case in the hallway in front of the former museum area (which is being filled by the Kaufman-Silver Library) and five other large wall-mounted displays in an adjacent hallway. Each window will have a different theme related to the history of Jewish life in Western Canada.

As well, each window will be wired so that viewers can listen to oral histories and search computer databases. The artifacts in the windows will be rotated on a regular basis, and there will also be permanent exhibits in the building related to Jewish athletes and education.

"Change is never easy," said JHC president Rona Davies, conceding that a number of museum supporters are unhappy about what's happening.

"We have spent hundreds of hours with professionals over the past few months determining our objectives and how to ensure that our exhibits and archives remain accessible to the public. We feel that with our new cabinets spread around the campus that we will have more display space than we had at the museum."

The JHC board is also looking to the Internet to make their resources available.

"We have also 300,000 photos and artifacts and over 60,000 of newspaper that we are scanning onto computer," Davies said.

"We also have a treasure trove of Yiddish songs. By putting it all online, we will be better able to preserve our sensitive materials, because there will be less handling of them.

"We think that a lot of great things are still in store for the Jewish Heritage Centre as these changes unfold."

As for future exhibitions, Davies said that the JHC will hire curators on a contract basis as required and that the exhibitions may be held at the campus or at other locations around the city.

Winnipeg couple trains for new cancer fundraiser

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — David and Hava Salita are in training for Winnipeg's first annual Weekend to End Breast Cancer.

On June 9 to 11, the young couple will join a group, anticipated to be in the thousands, who will participate in the marathon. They will walk a route covering 60 kilometres over two days through the streets of Winnipeg.

The fundraising marathon was inaugurated in Toronto four years ago by a board member of the Princess Margaret Hospital who saw a similar marathon in the United States.

Since that initial Toronto marathon, the event has spread to Vancouver (three years ago), Calgary and Montreal (two years ago) and Winnipeg, Edmonton and Ottawa this year. To date, the marathons have raised more than $376 million for breast cancer research.

On her page on the Weekend to End Breast cancer website – www.endcancer.ca – Hava Salita notes that it was her husband's idea to enter the marathon.

David Salita's mother, Enid, died of cancer on June 15, 2002. Although the cause of death was ovarian cancer, Enid Salita had breast cancer 25 years earlier. He recalls that he was six or seven at the time. She was diagnosed with ovarian cancer in the fall of 2001.

"She went through chemo and radiation, but it didn't help," he says.

David long wanted to do something to raise money for cancer research but didn't have the time before, he says. His father was also diagnosed with cancer in 2000.

While Hava doesn't have a family history of cancer, she has several family friends who have either had cancer themselves or have a history of it in their families – or both, she says.

Hava is originally from Vancouver. She came to Winnipeg to work at the library at the University of Manitoba after completing the librarian program at Langara College in British Columbia. She now works for the Bank of Nova Scotia. She and David, who works at a Tim Hortons outlet, met in the spring of 2003 – it was love at first sight, he says – and were married in October 2004.

David and Hava hope to put together a team of walkers under the "Enid's Angels" banner. They note that each participant is expected to raise a minimum $2,000 in pledges. With more than a month to go, the couple has raised $655 between them.

"We would like to raise more than the $2,000 minimum," David says, "but we will be happy with whatever we raise."

The event organizers will be erecting tents in which food will be served along the route, and massage and physiotherapists and doctors will be available. David says that among the participants will be cancer patients who are still undergoing treatment.

David and Hava Salita

All proceeds from the Winnipeg marathon are going to the CancerCare Manitoba Foundation.

The Toronto event this year is scheduled for Sept. 8 to 10.

Organ donation can be a 'posthumous mitzvah'

'By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Reluctance on the part of some Jews to donate organs is "a mindset problem rather than a halachic problem," according to Rabbi Reuven Bulka.

Speaking on behalf of Trillium Gift of Life, Ontario's organ and tissue donation agency, the Ottawa-based rabbi was one of five speakers at a recent symposium on end-of-life issues held at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Joining him at the Apr. 23 event were David Novak, an ordained rabbi who is a professor at the University of Toronto's Centre for the Study of Religion; lawyer Arthur Fish; Rabbi David Feldman, dean of the Jewish Institute of Bioethics in Teaneck, N.J; and Laurie Zoloth, professor of medical ethics and humanities at Northwestern University.

Jews are "traditional people," said Rabbi Bulka, explaining the slowness in accepting the idea of being organ donors. "We are so used to the idea that after a person passes away, that person is interred in the ground – that even the simple idea that there's a way station stop between death and burial which, beforehand, never existed... and is of life-saving proportions – we still have not gotten our head around it."

Changing the mindset will take "action by a significant rabbi," said Rabbi Bulka, who leads Congregation Machzikei Hadas, an Orthodox synagogue. He compared the issue to that of burial shrouds and modest coffins, instead of more expensive alternatives. "It was only because a great sage instructed that he be given a simple burial that we now take for granted that that's the way it is."

He cited an organization called the HOD (Halachic Organ Donation) Society, whose website includes a list of rabbis who have signed an organ donation card.

About 150 people die in Canada every year while they are waiting for an organ, said Rabbi Bulka. In Canada, if the family of a potential donor "balks at the idea of giving an organ, even if this was the expressed wish of the person who passed away, we don't proceed. I think it's part of the Canadian niceness."

From a Jewish perspective, the idea of having to have family consent is "bothersome," said Rabbi Bulka.

"No one has the right to deny a person the zechut, the merit, of saving someone else's life. If, in your will, you say you want your car to go to someone, that is not contested. But the idea that if you want your organ to save somebody's life, that can be contested – does not make any sense.

"What also does not make sense," he added, "is to stand in the way of someone doing a mitzvah, even if it's a posthumous mitzvah."

Ethically, it is hard to defend the position of being willing to accept an organ donation, but not being willing to donate one, he said. "If we accept the idea that we can take, we also have to accept the idea that we have a responsibility to give."

However, he said, few Canadians – less than 3.7 per cent – even donate blood, also a life-saving endeavour.

Donating offers "a great sense of fulfilment," he noted. Recalling his own donation of blood platelets that went to a two-year-old leukemia patient, Rabbi Bulka said he was "the recipient, not the donor." Nothing was more musical to his ears, he said, than to hear that he was saving a child's life.

For families of deceased organ donors, too, "when they are onside," it is "thrilling" to know that their gift has generated life.

Responding to a question about the Jewish tradition of burying intact bodies, Rabbi Bulka said the most important value in Jewish life is that of saving others' lives.

Burying a person whole is important, he acknowledged, "but this is no different than telling a person on Yom Kippur, 'You have to eat in order to save your life.'

"We have this pecking order of mitzvot," he said. "If what happens in the end is that you're saving a life, then you're doing the greater mitzvah."

Brownie points will point you in the right direction

By NORENE GILLETZ

No one can resist a chocolate dessert, especially if it's a brownie! Lisa Slater calls brownies "the little black dress of the baking trade… Dress them up with a necklace of raspberries or serve them no-frills, stacked one on top of the other for easy access."

Slater created more than 100 fabulous chocolate recipes for her cookbook Brownie Points (Whitecap). It's chock full of mouth-watering photos that will beckon you to bake them, eat them and love them. You'll find rich and fudgy basic brownies, as well as brownies baked into puddings, cookies, pancakes and tarts.

Recipes include Brownie Blintzes, Brownie Triscotti, Brownie Pecan Torte, Chocolate Rugelah, The Ultimate Brownie Cheesecake and Raspberry Meringue Molten Chocolate Cake. None of the recipes takes more than 15 minutes to prepare. It's a chocolate lover's dream!

There is a comprehensive guide to ingredients, including types of chocolate, required equipment, baking tips and storage. You'll find helpful information on easy slicing so that you can make professional-looking bars. Each recipe offers "brownie points" – hints for working with brownies or adapting a particular recipe for a variety of uses.

Slater offers tricks of the trade on how to rescue mushy/greasy brownies and overbaked ones. She says, "Professional chefs rarely throw anything out. There's so much you can do with brownie batter that you should never throw it out, unless you have burned it. (For that, there really is no cure.)"

Slater was born in New York City into a family of restaurateurs. She is a pastry chef who opened her first eatery in New York when she was 28. She started the bakery department at Whole Foods Market in Toronto, where she is now a manager.

Her dedication is heartfelt and witty. She dedicated Brownie Points to "My parents, who are living proof that brownies promote longevity, my husband, who is living proof that brownies aren't fattening, and my children, who are living proof that brownies make you smart!"

HALVAH BROWNIE COOKIES

You can omit the diced apricots (or substitute raisins) but Slater found that apricots enhance the shelf-life of the cookies and add a subtle zing, so try them at least once. Halvah can frequently be found in the candy section or specialty section of grocery stores and certainly in markets catering to Middle Eastern or Mediterranean communities.

12½ oz. halvah
1 egg
4 tbsp. flour
¼ cup brown sugar
⅛ tsp. kosher salt
5½ oz. dried apricots, diced (about 20)

Preheat oven to 350. Line two cookie sheets with parchment paper.

Place halvah in the bowl of a food processor fitted with the steel blade. Process until mixture is smooth. Add chocolate and process until combined. Add egg and process until smooth. Add flour, brown sugar and salt. Process just until smooth. Turn mixture into a bowl and add apricots. Dough will be fairly thick, but don't worry.

Use a teaspoon to scoop mounds of dough onto cookie sheet, about 12 per pan. Bake for about 12 minutes or until cookies are just firm to the touch. Don't overbake them. Place on a rack to cool. Makes 48 cookies.

Brownie point: You can enhance the sesame taste of the halvah and add some additional crunch by rolling the dough into balls, dropping them into a bowl of sesame seeds and tossing to coat completely. Place on cookie sheet and flatten into a fat disk with the palm of your hand. Bake as above. When cooled, you can eat them as is or dip half in melted chocolate!

Use your crock pot and come home to find dinner ready

BY SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

There are many days when it's hard to get a meal on the table, either because we lack motivation or because we're busy. When we've had an active day and by 5 p.m. we're worn out and not in the mood to cook, too many of us end up eating fast food more often than we should, or we eat a meal that tastes as if there was no effort put into it.

Most likely, you have the solution sitting on your kitchen counter or in a cabinet. Too many people let their crock pots sit unused except for Shabbat. Absentee cooking is one of the best time-savers around. An entire meal, complete with vegetables, can be prepared in one pot. Or, if you just want the main dish taken care of, add a salad and bread to the feast when you're ready to serve.

Another benefit of the crock pot is that it doesn't heat up the kitchen. This can be valuable in the summer. You'll enjoy the delicious aroma of your food cooking all day. And you can even cook desserts in a crock pot.

That doesn't mean you have to use it every night, but if you're expecting a busy day, take a few minutes the night before to assemble your dish and refrigerate it. The next morning, plug it in – and turn it on – before you leave the house, and you'll be rewarded with a cooked dinner when you arrive home that night.

These recipes can cook all day (as long as 10 hours). Dinners can be served at 6, and the stew is always perfect. Almost every other slow-cooker recipe you come across will do fine if prepared the night before.

Before you add any ingredients to your crock pot, spray it with non-stick cooking spray, and it will be very easy to clean. I've also seen cooking bags on the market specifically for crock pots. Just put all the ingredients into the bag and insert it into your crock pot.

PINEAPPLE BEEF

5 lb. beef roast, browned to melt out fat
1 onion, sliced
1 red bell pepper, coarsely chopped
¼ cup brown sugar, not packed
1 can crushed pineapple or a fresh one, sliced
1-2 tbsp. tomato paste
a splash or two of soy sauce pepper
pinch of ground ginger

Put all ingredients into your slow cooker. Cook it all day, on low. The beef gets fall-apart tender and needs just a little rice to go with it.

CROCK POT BARBECUE BEEF

3 to 4 lb. beef chuck roast
1 12-oz. can beer
1 14-oz. bottle ketchup
½ cup brown sugar

Mix the sugar, beer and ketchup and put it with chuck roast beef in crockpot. Cook on high 6-8 hours or until you can easily cut and shred the beef by running a knife through it. Shred and serve. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

TURKEY BREAST

5- to 6-lb. turkey breast
¼ cup margarine, melted or oil fresh ground pepper to taste
3 cloves garlic, minced
2 tbsp. cornstarch

Wash turkey breast thoroughly and pat dry with paper towels. Sprinkle pepper over all. Do not add salt. Place in large crock pot. Melt margarine in microwave oven and pour over turkey breast. Add garlic.

Leave lid on and cook on high for 6 to 7 hours, or until turkey gets brown and juices run clear when pierced with a knife.

Pour the juice from the crockpot into a saucepan. Bring to boil slowly, then add a cornstarch which has been dissolved in about 1½ cups cold water. Stir with a whisk. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

Rabbi Zaltzman marks 25 years on the job

Head of city's Russian community

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It is a measure of the influence of the late Lubavitcher rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Schneerson, that members of that chassidic movement would consult with him for assistance – or in many cases, direction – on life-altering decisions.

For many, the rebbe's word was final, so 25 years ago, Rabbi Yosef Zaltzman packed up his family and, on the advice of the rebbe, moved to Toronto. At the time, he was entertaining offers to minister to Russian Jewish communities in Vienna, Orange County, Calif., Miami and Sydney, Australia.

Rabbi Yosef Zaltzman

Looking back on his decision, Rabbi Zaltzman, now 50, has no regrets. Toronto, after all, has plenty of kosher food, an established Jewish community and freedom to worship.

But, as he told his wife, Chiena, before they were married, "I would go wherever the Rebbe said. And she agreed." The Rebbe, he added, "sees things beyond the level we can see."

With family ties to the Lubavitch movement going back generations, Rabbi Zaltzman believes that "every person who comes to the world has a mission."

For him, that has meant a career working as part "of the Rebbe's army to spread Yiddishkeit, to help Jews with their Jewish needs."

Rabbi Zaltzman recently marked the 25th anniversary of his arrival in Toronto. When he came to the city, Toronto's Russian Jewish population was small but growing, thanks to a loosening of the emigration restrictions imposed by the former Soviet regime. But Jews, who had endured more than 60 years of official Communist atheism, were arriving with little understanding of Jewish history, tradition, culture or religious practices.

It was Rabbi Zaltzman's job to bring Russian émigrés closer to their Jewish roots and to do it in a way that did not alienate those who grew up being told religion was nothing more than the opiate of the masses.

"My task was to help Russian Jews rebuild, fund and discover what Communist Russia robbed from us," he said.

When he arrived in Toronto from New York, there were some 1,500 families in the Russian community. Most were recent arrivals, having lived in Canada two or three years, on average.

Today, he estimates, there are about 10,000 Russian families in the Toronto area, or altogether about 35,000 Russian Jews.

Rabbi Zaltzman called on his Toronto connections – he'd spent three weeks in the city in 1978 when he was studying at an American yeshiva – and with a list of a few names in hand, he began visiting his new flock.

His technique – one promoted by the Rebbe – was simple and tailored to meet the ingrained skepticism of Russians.

"I took the approach of giving a smorgasbord of Judaism, to put on the table everything I have, give them a plate and let them eat."

If they wanted mezuzahs on their doors, he would arrange it. He would suggest they consider a brit milah, and he would explain its significance and inform them that most non-Jewish Canadian are circumcised. (He estimates more than 4,000 brit milahs have been performed on adult Russian émigrés and today, 97 per cent of the community's infants are circumcised).

He invited families to celebrate Shabbat at his home, exposing them to the rituals of candlelighting and Kiddush.

Over the years, Rabbi Zaltzman has met thousands of Russians. If he heard Russian being spoken in a store, he'd walk over, introduce himself and start a conversation.

"That's how I got to know people one-by-one and build a community," he said.

He believes he can point to many successes in re-integrating Russian Jews into Jewish life.

For instance, on Passover in 1981, he led a seder that attracted more than 100 people. "Now we're making seders in seven locations. Many from the early days make it in their own homes."

Today, he added, only "a very small per cent do not have a mezuzah."

In 1983, Rabbi Zaltzman first published a Russian-language monthly, Exodus. Its first run saw 1,600 issues distributed. Today, more than 10,000 copies are printed in Russian and 7,000 in English.

In 1985, Rabbi Zaltzman established the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC), to provide a central address for the community. The first Russian synagogue also opened that year in space rented at the Bernard Betel Centre, and from there, the JRCC moved to a small space on Rockford Road that doubled as a house of worship and a community centre.

"It was small," he said, "but it was the first thing that the Russian community could say is ours." Today, the JRCC offers services in seven different houses of worship.

In 1990 the JRCC introduced Sunday schools. That was followed four years later with a preschool program and in 1997, a day school serving the community opened. The JRCC's adult education programs have also proven popular, with 1,000 people a week attending a variety of classes.

During the High Holy Days, the synagogues fill up with 5,000 to 7,000 worshippers. This past March, more than 2,000 attended several Purim celebrations.

Though the community has come closer to Jewish life, ties with the pre-existing, organized community have been subject to disagreements. In 1981, Rabbi Zaltzman recalled, the precursor to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto wanted Russian Jews to integrate into the established community. But that couldn't work, he said, since "it's a different community with a unique mentality. That needs a unique way to deal with it.

"We have to feel we're equal members of the Jewish community. When you're equal, you feel more comfortable to join. If you still feel as a guest, you feel uncomfortable," he added.

In one important respect, Rabbi Zaltzman has introduced Canadian and Jewish values to a key element of community life – fundraising. Both Russian and Canadian Jews contribute to the JRCC.

Igor Korenzvit, chair of the JRCC board of governors, said one of Rabbi Zaltzman's accomplishments has been educating Russians about the Jewish concept of tzedakah (charity) and helping those in need.

That value did not exist in the former Soviet Union, he said.

As a result of Rabbi Zaltzman's efforts, the Russian community has become more self-sufficient. Twenty-five years ago, only about five per centof the JRCC's budget came from funds raised among Russians. Today, as much as 70 per cent of the organization's $4-million budget is raised from Russians.

Korenzvit credited Rabbi Zaltzman with being much more than a fundraiser. He's the glue that binds the community together. Without the rabbi, "it would fall apart and would put a larger strain on the larger Jewish community," Korenzvit said.

During Rabbi Zaltzman's tenure in Toronto, "the community has changed drastically from being disorganized – not even a community – to being an organized Russian Jewish community and part of the wider Jewish community," Korenzvit said.

Rabbi Zaltzman is proud of the work he's done and the services he's introduced to Russian Jews. Hundreds of families have been drawn closer to Judaism, he said, but much work remains to be done, particularly in addressing problems of wayward youth and assimilation.

Still, he said, if you look at Russian communities across the continent, "then Toronto is a very significant success."

It was hard to be a Jew in Soviet Union

There's a joke Rabbi Yosef Zaltzman likes to tell about the most recent addition to his family, two-year-old Batsheva. Sometimes, her nephews – his grandchildren – grab her pacifier and he has to tell them, "You're not allowed to take your aunt's pacifier."

With 14 children and five grandchildren, Rabbi Zaltzman, who recently celebrated his 50th birthday, is a living testament to the Bible's first commandment to go forth and multiply. He counts among his children rabbis, rebbitzens and community leaders.

They practise their Judaism openly – a far cry from his youth in Moscow, where every effort was made to hide the fact he was being raised as an observant Jew.

When Rabbi Zaltzman was a boy, the Cold War was at its height and the Soviet Union persecuted religions. With chassidic blood in his family going back generations, the young Yosef (a popular name in the former Soviet Union) had to grow up "underground."

"Jewish life was under the table, hidden," he said.

Even the source of his given names, Yosef Yitzchok, after a revered Lubavitch rabbi, had to be hidden from authorities. A subterfuge was employed in which his grandfathers argued in a public venue over whether he should be named Yosef or Yitzchok. His uncle found a compromise – give him both names. To snitches in the crowd, sure to inform Soviet authorities, it appeared as if the boy was not being named for the rabbi.

To give him a yeshiva education and keep him from attending secular Russian schools where boys and girls sat at the same desks – something not allowed young Lubavitch boys – another subterfuge was employed. Education authorities in Moscow were told he was at school in Samarkand in central Asia, where one of his grandfathers lived, while school authorities in Samarkand were told he was studying in Moscow.

In fact he was at home, being taught both Judaic and secular studies. It was a practice that could have landed his parents in jail for three years.

To maintain the evasion, the young Yosef Yitzchok did not leave the house for 10 months of each school year, venturing outside only during summer vacation.

In 1966, his parents first applied to leave the Soviet Union. They were refused.

"For Jews, it was hard in Russia," Rabbi Zaltzman recalled. "For someone who wanted their children to grow up Jewish, it was impossible."

In the summer of 1968, when he was 12, he accompanied his grandfather, who had been badly wounded in World War II, to a mikvah in one of the few synagogues that were allowed to remain open. Aware there were informers all about, the young Yosef knew he could not openly say "Amen" during prayers for fear that someone would conclude he was secretly studying the Jewish religion.

In 1971, his family was finally given permission to emigrate and they departed for Israel. They were among the first wave of Russians to leave for the Holy Land. They remained there only a short time before moving to New York, where the revered Lubavitch Rebbe, Menachem Schneerson, resided.

Zaltzman studied at the Rabbinical College of America in Morristown, N.J., and during his time in the area, he met the Rebbe five times.

"This was the strongest Jewish experience of my life," he said.

In 1979, while attending his sister's wedding in Israel, he met Chiena, the woman who would become his wife. With the Rebbe's approval, the two were married later that year. In 1980, they became parents for the first time, and in early 1981, they accepted an offer to move to Toronto.

Israeli soldiers, activists injured in Hebron clash

By YAAKOV KATZ and TOVAH LAZAROFF
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Seventeen police officers and soldiers and seven right-wing activists were injured during clashes in Hebron early Sunday morning.

On Friday and on Saturday night, hundreds of right-wing activists came to Hebron to reinforce resistance to the planned evacuation of three settler families in a building just outside the city's Avraham Avinu neighbourhood. A Palestinian man's claim that he owns the building, which the settlers claim he sold, is currently being reviewed by Israel's High Court of Justice.

The court ordered that the families be evicted early this week.

Close to 1,000 police and soldiers participated in the eviction that began at first light Sunday.

Two Molotov cocktails thrown at police by unidentified assailants exploded but did not hurt anyone. The police were wounded by stones thrown at them, while the activists were hurt in the clashes.

Tires were set on fire in the area and tensions were high in the city over the weekend and into Sunday morning.

Earlier Saturday, violence broke out between activists and police, with settlers throwing eggs and light bulbs filled with paint at police officers stationed near the house. Police said an explosive device was also thrown at security forces.

Court orders families evicted

David Wilder, speaking for Hebron's Jewish community, said he feared the building would collapse during the evacuation.

"We have engineering reports that if several hundred people try to move into the house, it's possible that the ceilings would collapse," he said.

The security forces' decision to carry out the removal, knowing the unstable nature of the buildings, showed "they would be happy if a few Jews were killed," Wilder charged.

The evacuation had originally been scheduled for Friday, but it was postponed because of concerns that if the evacuation lasted until nightfall, security forces and settlers would be forced to violate Shabbat. On Friday, the High Court of Justice gave security forces until Monday to evacuate the building.

The officers planned to give the settlers an ultimatum demanding they leave the building, and if they failed to comply they would be forcefully removed.

Special Forces and additional soldiers were on standby nearby in case the settlers fired at the evacuating force or Palestinians launched terror attacks.

On Friday afternoon, the IDF designated the area as a closed military zone, to prevent additional activists from reaching the structure.

Wilder said more than 100 people, including the three families and supporters from outside the city, spent Shabbat together inside. To demonstrate their solidarity, the rest of the community held prayer services on the street outside, he said.

He said the evacuation was just the "first taste of what many communities throughout the State of Israel will have to deal with."

During the evacuation, the police kept their calm, as did the settlers, who barely resisted the actual eviction. Mothers sat on cots in the sparsely furnished rooms, holding their children as they waited for the security forces.

After climbing the narrow, dark, stone stairwell, security forces knocked on each of the three apartment doors and then pushed them open. Many of the family members calmly walked out, while some of the children held pillows.

The three families moved into the building in early April. According to court documents, the families claim that the former owner of the building sold it to a Palestinian, Hani el-Batash, who then rented it to Tal Investments and Construction Ltd. for three years. The company said it subsequently sublet the building to Yisrael and Tzipora Schlissel and two other families, including six adults and 16 children.

The original owner has denied selling the house, and police maintain that two of the documents relating to the alleged sale are forgeries.

On Thursday, the High Court rejected a petition by the families for a temporary injunction to delay the evacuation until the court decides if the families have a legal right to live in the building.

Hebron settlers distributed cameras among the youth gathered there over the weekend, to document the evacuation and any "unjustified police violence."

Orit Struck, a spokesperson for the Hebron Jewish community, said the fact that the security forces forced Jews to leave a building was terrible, but she nonetheless commended them for following the law during the evacuation.

Government survives no-confidence vote

Jerusalem Post

A no-confidence motion against the new government was defeated in the Knesset on Monday by 50 votes to 28, with 20 abstentions.

Meanwhile, Knesset speaker Dalia Itzik instructed Knesset members that they were to continue deliberations on the state budget until 11:00 p.m. She added that, starting first thing Tuesday morning until late Tuesday night, they were to discuss nothing but the budget.

The two days of marathon talks come following concerns of some members of the Knesset that they did not have time to study and discuss the budget.

Opposition MKs won a small victory over the government Monday by pushing back the vote on the 2006 state budget by two days.

The budget was scheduled to go to a first reading and vote in the Knesset Monday afternoon. However, following the objections of several Pensioner and Labor MKs to the hike in the bread prices, the Knesset's interim house committee decided to delay the vote to Wednesday.

While Kadima MKs shrugged off the delay, calling it a "generous gesture" to allow other parties to review the budget, others said it pointed to the weakness of Olmert's coalition.

"It's the first week in the Knesset and Olmert's government is already coming apart at the seams," said one Likud MK. "That's what happens when you have a small coalition of the greedy."

In addition to the opposition parties, several MKs within the coalition have also announced that they would vote against the budget in its current form.

In Labor, Defence Minister and Party Chair Amir Peretz called on all members of his faction Monday to support the budget. MKs Shelly Yachimovich, Yoram Marciano and Nadia Hilou have said that they would not vote in favour of the budget.

"We cannot continue to sit here in our posts in the Knesset and do nothing over the fact that more and more children do not have enough to eat," said Hilou. "If the budget is not changed to do more for the weaker sectors of society, I will vote against it."

Several MKs from the Pensioners party also threatened to vote against the budget, and possibly withdraw from the coalition altogether if the hike in bread prices was not revoked.

"This way of thinking is abnormal and unfair," said MK Moshe Sharoni (Pensioners). "Where is the Labor party in all of this, the so-called socially minded party? The government is giving NIS 1.3 billion to Shas, and doesn't have a few million to keep from raising the price of bread!"

Sharoni said that as many as six other members of the Pensioners party could leave the coalition over the issue.

On Sunday, the cabinet approved the NIS 284.2 billion budget, together with the Economic Arrangements Law.

In its current form, the budget is identical to the one prepared by Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu and presented to the Knesset in October 2005.

After an initial reading and vote, the budget will go to the Knesset finance committee for changes and then back to the plenum for a second and third vote.

Government officials said that changes to the budget stemming from promises granted during coalition talks would be made in the Knesset's finance committee.

By law, the Knesset must approve the budget within 45 days following establishment of the new government, or the Knesset is dispersed and the country goes back to elections.

Hamas armed forces prepare for action

By KHALED ABU TOAMEH
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Hamas' new security force is expected to start operating in the Gaza Strip next week, sources in the Palestinian Authority's interior ministry said Saturday.

Meanwhile, Hamas leaders warned over the weekend of a new intifadah and said they would "chop off" the head of anyone who works to bring down their cabinet. The warnings were made during huge demonstrations in the West Bank and Gaza in support of the Hamas cabinet and in protest against U.S.-led sanctions on it.

The 3,000-strong force, which consists largely of Hamas militiamen, was established last month by Interior Minister Said Siam to help PA security forces enforce law and order in Gaza.

The decision to establish the new force has enraged PA President Mahmoud Abbas, who responded by issuing a presidential decree forbidding the interior minister from pursuing his plan under the pretext it's illegal.

However, the Hamas cabinet, which has ignored Abbas' decree, managed to recruit hundreds of militiamen to the new force. Abbas and his aides have expressed fear that Hamas is trying to undermine the PA security forces, whose members are affiliated with Fatah.

Khaled Abu Hilal, spokesperson for the interior ministry, said the new force would officially start operating May 14 by participating in a major security operation against illegal construction along Gaza City's beach.

He said a joint operations room comprising members all of the PA security forces had been set up to supervise the campaign, which is also aimed at "liberating" public land illegally seized by Palestinians over the past few years. Many families, armed groups and senior PA officials are reported to have exploited the state of anarchy in Gaza to grab public land and build houses and businesses on it.

Abu Hilal said the new security force, whose members will wear special uniforms, will assist the various branches of the PA security forces during the operation, the first of its kind since Hamas formed a government in March.

He revealed that the interior ministry is also preparing to launch a similar campaign to confiscate "illegal" weapons in Gaza and is seeking the backing of large clans for the drive. Leaders of several clans have already agreed to co-operate with the ministry by signing a document prohibiting the use of weapons in local disputes.

The spokesperson, however, stressed the campaign is not directed against militias that are fighting against Israel.

"We want to end the chaos of weapons," he said. "The only ones who will be allowed to carry weapons are the policemen who are in charge of law and order and members of the resistance groups who are confronting Israeli aggression."

On Friday, thousands of Palestinians took to the streets to protest against the international sanctions against the Hamas cabinet. The protests were held under the motto, 'Yes to starvation, no to capitulation." In Ramallah, local residents donated more than $60,000 (US) in cash and two kilograms of gold to the Hamas cabinet.

Interior Minister Siam threatened to "turn the table over the heads of all those who are trying to foil the Hamas cabinet." Addressing supporters in Khan Yunis, he reiterated Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel's right to exist.

"We can't accept the existence of the criminals, executioners and murderers on our blessed lands," he said. "We won't change our position."

Hassan al-Safi, a senior Hamas official in Gaza, warned that the international sanctions would lead to a "third intifadah." He added: "This time it will be a regional intifadah that will change the balance of power in the region."

Addressing U.S. President George W. Bush, Safi said: "We will chop off the head of anyone who tries to bring down our cabinet. The U.S. wants us to succumb and become its slaves, but we won't give in because we are free and sovereign."

Olmert to crack down on 'illegal squatting'

"Wherever the law is violated, wherever there is illegal squatting and wherever there are attempts to determine these kinds of facts, we will respond immediately, without compromise," he told the cabinet, a government communique stated.

"We have reiterated that we will not countenance the illegal determination of facts and violations of the law anywhere, certainly not in these sensitive areas."

Olmert has taken a harsher stance than did Sharon in cracking down on illegal Jewish settlements in the West Bank, as was first seen during February's razing of illegal structures at the Amona outpost, a controversial operation that left 200 people injured.

Eldan Rent-a-Car in Israel
Duty Free Special Offer

He also pledged to push ahead with his convergence plan, which would see the forced evacuation of residents from scores of isolated West Bank settlements, while strengthening the major settlement blocs.

Olmert indicated that he will act unilaterally if the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority government continues in its refusal to recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous peace agreements.

Defence Minister Amir Peretz told the cabinet that a closure imposed on the West Bank two months ago, as a result of security warnings of impending terror attacks, was being gradually eased. Acting on the recommendation of security officials, Peretz approved the entry of 12,000 Palestinian workers in a move he said was aimed at both enabling the Palestinian population to have a respectable daily life and preventing Israelis from being harmed.

He did not say if a there had been a decrease in the number of terror alerts that led to the move at this time.

By mid-afternoon Sunday, Olmert's office was already feeding television stations silent footage of the premier at work in his office, where he was seen receiving a military briefing while adjusting the office computer. The office, now bereft of Sharon's chair, which was sent to his Sycamore Ranch, has been adorned with Olmert family photos.

Meanwhile, at the conclusion of the changing of the guard ceremony at the Prime Minister's Office, Olmert tried in his address to office workers to put the best face on the somewhat awkward situation: "You can ask the guys at the Finance Ministry, at the Industry, Trade and Labour Ministry and at the Jerusalem Municipality ... it's not terrible to work with me."

Israel Briefs

Independence Day in Israel

Israel celebrated its 58th birthday. Independence Day was launched last Tuesday night with the annual rally at Mount Herzl in Jerusalem, where select citizens lit 12 candles symbolizing the ancient Tribes of Israel. Officiating was MK Shimon Peres, who urged Israelis: "Don't cease to dream about peace." But he also stressed the strength of the Jewish state, which is under threat from arch-foe Iran's nuclear program. "Our might is unmatched," he said. Israelis marked the public holiday by wearing blue and white clothes, attending fireworks displays and feasting at traditional outdoor barbecues. Israel's population is 7,026,000, almost nine times what it was in 1948, at independence.

Year of Negev and Galilee

Israel inaugurated its 58th year as the year of "Development of the Negev and the Galilee." The decision is part of the government's plan to make these areas a focus of development and investment, together with the Jewish community abroad. In November, the government approved a $3.8 billion (US), 10-year strategic plan for the development of the Negev, and a similar proposal for Galilee development is planned.

Fatah creates its own militia

Gunmen from Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' movement said they've formed a militia to counter Hamas police, media reported. The 2,000-strong militia will "protect Fatah's sons and Fatah's institutions against attacks, whether from Israel or from parties" at home, spokesperson Al-Muatasem Billah said. Reuters quoted him as saying the group doesn't want to clash with Hamas police, "but if it happens, we will not stand handcuffed." The move raises concerns, as factional violence wounded 30 people last month.

Jim Carrey visits Israel

Comic actor Jim Carrey visited Israel last week. The Canadian-born film star crossed into Eilat on foot from Egypt, where he was vacationing with Israeli friends. Carrey was to be in Israel for several days on a private tour. This past Sunday, he was expected to visit Jerusalem's Western Wall. His visit came after Israel trips by actors Will Smith and Ewan McGregor.

Synagogue vandalized

Twenty swastikas, as well as what police described as satanic symbols, were found scrawled over the main synagogue in Petach Tikva last Thursday. The Torah ark and stacks of prayer books were ransacked. Locals said the synagogue had previously been vandalized, but never to such an extent. The discovery last year of a swastika tattoo on an Israeli soldier who had immigrated from the former Soviet Union prompted legislation for a crackdown on neo-Nazis in the Jewish state.

First woman speaker

Dalia Itzik was sworn in last week as the Knesset's first female speaker. A former cabinet minister and Labor Party veteran, the Kadima member was sworn in as the Knesset convened to approve Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's new government.

Peace plebiscite pledged

Mahmoud Abbas said he would put any Israeli-Palestinian peace deal to a referendum, circumventing the Hamas government. The Palestinian Authority president, who has been struggling to restart peacemaking since the Islamic terror group took power in the West Bank and Gaza, pitched the plebiscite idea in an Israeli newspaper interview last week. "The Palestinian people will decide, and I am certain that there is an overwhelming majority among the Palestinian people for peace, and an overwhelming majority in favor of an accord with Israel," Abbas told Ma'ariv. Israel shelved peace talks after Hamas, which seeks its destruction, crushed Abbas' long-dominant Fatah faction in PA elections last January.

The imposing, reddish-gold mountain sits directly on the Syrian-African Rift, an active fault line. Since Herod the Great built his luxury palace on the mountain's northern face more than two millennia ago, at least five major earthquakes have hit, causing rock slides and some damage to the man-made structures. Harsh desert weather continues to impose its own disintegrative effect.

"The terraces of the palace were much larger than what they are today," Hatzor says. "There have been failures and erosions since Herod built it. We can see deterioration of the stones due to rain even in the time period we have been involved in preservation efforts on the mountain."

Masada is not one solid rock. It is composed of horizontal layers of sedimentary rock and is fractured by vertical cracks or "joints" formed by tectonic stresses in the earth's crust. These horizontal and vertical joints give the mountain its particular wall-like appearance of huge irregular bricks piled one on top of the other. They also make it vulnerable to seismic tremors.

Work began in 1998, when Israel's National Parks Service began construction of a new cable car to ferry greater numbers of visitors up Masada. They called in Hatzor to evaluate the mountain's stability, something that had never been done before.

Hatzor and his team studied the Snake Path cliff on the mountain's eastern side, which connects the cable car station to an adjoining bridge, and found several large rocks precariously poised. Using a three-dimensional stability analysis, the team determined that some blocks of rock in the cliff face might dislodge even in a relatively small tremor.

Hatzor recommended "cable bolting," an engineering technique he'd studied a decade earlier as a doctoral student at Berkeley. He suggested inserting 60-foot-long steel cables through individual blocks and into the solid rock, so the rock's own weight pushing against the cables would act as a stabilizing force.

Stepping off the cable car one morning last month, Hatzor points to an enormous yellow block of rock that hovers menacingly over the walkway visitors traverse on their way to the ruins.

Following his instructions, 30 anchors were inserted into the rock block before the new cable car was built. Though the enormous block still seems to be hanging in midair, Hatzor says it is now perfectly safe. Rock-coloured covers hide the end of the anchors from view, preserving the esthetics.

Hatzor's monitoring system also showed, for the first time, the effects of climatic change on rock movement.

"Why does a block decide to move?" Glaser asks. "Yossi's preliminary monitoring suggested that perhaps it's due to very small changes in temperature, to expansion and contraction of rock over time."

The findings caused quite a buzz in international geological circles.

After the cable car project, Hatzor's team was asked to study the stability of Herod's palace on the northern side of the mountain. They conducted a computer simulation using dynamic Discontinuous Deformation Analysis, a new numerical method, also developed at UC-Berkeley, for measuring the risk of rock movement. Using data from a 7.1 quake in the northern Sinai in 1995, Hatzor's simulation found that a similar tremor at Masada could cause shards of rock to come crashing down the cliff.

"To ensure lasting preservation of this historic gem, the north face should be reinforced," he says, a project he estimates would require several million dollars.

Eitan Campbell, director of Masada National Park, wants to make sure that happens, even though there is no budget for it yet.

Campbell has worked at Masada for more than 30 years, starting as a teenager hauling bags of cement for archeologist Yigal Yadin, who initially excavated the site in the mid-1960s.

Two years of heavy winter rains have caused significant damage to the 2,000-year-old structures, Campbell says.

"The whole top of the mountain was one big pool of water, I've never seen anything like it. A couple of the walls collapsed," he says.

In mid-August, Glaser expects to arrive from Berkeley with his new monitoring system. He and Hatzor will set up seismic monitoring stations at the visitors centre at the base of the mountain and at the watchtower on top.

Gauges will be installed to measure the effects of temperature, humidity, barometric pressure and tidal pull on the mouths of cracks, "to measure how the crack opens and closes and whether there's any horizontal movement," Glaser explains.

In addition, the scientists will compare movement at the mountain's base to movement at its top, examining, for example, how the rock responds to tidal changes at different times of the day.

The system has not been tried anywhere else.

"This will be its field test," Glaser says.

Masada was chosen, he says, because of its historical and archeological importance, and because Israeli interest guaranteed easy and uninterrupted access to the site.

THROW A BAR MITZVAH—OR BUSINESS LUNCH—THAT ROCKS!

Whether it's a bar mitzvah, bat mitzvah, bubbie's birthday or a business banquet, the Toronto Hard Rock is where they'll always treat you like a rock star.

After all, points out the Cafe's event manager Marcelo DeOliveira, it was a Hard Rock crew that provided backstage catering for last year's Live8 concert, as well as its illustrious predecessor, Live Aid, two decades prior.

With 14,000 square feet over two levels, including a separate nightclub and streetside patio, the Hard Rock in Toronto offers a wide variety of configurations for a wide variety of events, from family celebrations to Fortune 500 conferences, breakfast through late-night.

Says DeOliveira: "We've hosted countless bar and bat mitzvahs, corporate receptions, product launches, press conferences and weddings. We've put on events for 50 guests and for 500, hosting everyone from Deloitte & Touche to the big music company BMG. And people love the place. It's a very special environment."

As if to make his point, DeOliveira walks a visitor past some of the priceless rock memorabilia hanging on the wall. There's Bob Dylan's autographed guitar from the cover of a 1984 live album and a handmade mariachi suit he wore on tour. There's a pair of sketches by John Lennon, a fur-trimmed purple jacket that belonged to Prince, and an outrageous pair of platform shoes from the closet of Stanley Eisen—better known as Paul Stanley of Kiss. That's not to mention the beautiful custom instrument once owned by Canadian guitar virtuoso, Alex Lifeson, of Rush.

DeOliveira explains that his staff will design exactly the experience a guest is looking for. "You can do a sit-down dinner or a buffet—for instance, our bar and bat mitzvah buffet includes, among other things, lox canapes, spanikopita, caesar salad, roasted chicken and lasagna. We have great sound, great lighting and video monitors throughout the Cafe. We can set up for dancing or karaoke. We can even put together really fun loot bags from our Rock Shop. Whatever you need. Because to us—whether you're a certified public accountant or a certified 13-year-old—you're a rock star."

Alternative treatment for sleep apnea

I was very pleased to see such an overwhelming interest in the article on alternative treatments to sleep apnea printed in the March 30 issue of The Canadian Jewish News. The reader response to our office indicates that a significant number of people are unaware that oral appliance therapy is a recognized treatment for sleep apnea. To increase public awareness, I have arranged to reprint the article

Dr. Les Priemer.

Ken Gibbs was lucky if he managed to get two to three hours of sleep a night. Afflicted with a severe case of sleep apnea, Gibbs' breathing stopped 60 times an hour, causing him to wake up and violently shake his bed. Night after night of restless sleep made life difficult for Gibbs, a truck driver who works 12-hour shifts.

"It really affected my day," he said. "I was exhausted most of the time. It takes a toll on your body, and mentally and physically, it burns you out."

Sleep apnea is a potentially life-threatening sleep disorder in which the airway becomes blocked during sleep, leading to an obstruction in breathing. Once a sleep apneic's blood oxygen level starts to drop, the brain realizes that the person is suffocating, causing them to wake up in order to resume breathing

Many sleep apneics are not even aware of having had a sleep disruption. But because they continually wake up, their sleep is fragmented and of poor quality, causing them to feel tired and potentially leading to a host of other health problems. Sleep apnea is associated with depression and memory lapses. Studies report sleep apneics are four to eight times more likely to have a heart attack or stroke.

Oral-appliance therapy, a treatment for sleep apnea, is now being recommended by the American Academy of Sleep Medicine for patients with moderate cases of sleep apnea. Until recently, the Academy had only recommended the treatment, which has been around since the late 1980s, for patients with mild cases. The degree of severity of sleep apnea is diagnosed according to the number of breathing interruptions per hour. Forty or more interruptions per hour is considered severe, 20 to 40 - moderate, 10 to 20 - mild and less than 10 is regarded as primary snoring.

Dr. Les Priemer, a North York-area dentist who has been treating sleep apneics with oral-appliance therapy for 11 years, says there is a lack of knowledge among many patients about the treatment. "Patients walk into my office and say, 'How come nobody ever told me about this before?"' Relief for those with sleep apnea has traditionally come in the form of a device called a continuous positive airway pressure (CPAP) machine. A nasal mask connected to a hose is in turn connected to a pump. The pump provides pressure through the mask to prevent the sleeper's airway from becoming blocked.

Although an effective treatment for the condition, the CPAP machine is cumbersome and slightly noisy, the mask can be uncomfortable and it can be less than agreeable to the sleeper's bedmate. And while CPAP has been traditionally recommended as the only first-line treatment for moderate sleep apnea cases, the new the American Academy of Sleep Medicine guidelines mean oral appliance therapy can now be recommended as a first-line treatment as well

Gibbs had severe sleep apnea and oral-appliance therapy has worked well for him. He has been using it for two years and says it's helped turn his life around, estimating his condition has improved by 75 per cent.

"When I got the appliance, it was incredible," he said. "I don't go to bed without it."

Diagnosed with sleep apnea about nine years ago, Gibbs initially used a CPAP machine to manage his condition. Although it helped him, he found the machine cumbersome to travel with and less than ideal for personal reasons.

"You definitely don't want this if you're married because you have a hose in your nose – it's not very romantic," he said.

Oral-appliance therapy consists of a mouthpiece, usually made out of acrylic, that rests on the top and bottom arches of the mouth and which are connected. A hinge allows the lower jaw to be comfortably moved forward, which in turn pulls the tongue off the back of the airway and allows the person to achieve more normal breathing.

Dr. Priemer estimates that around 1.4 million Canadians suffer from sleep apnea. Often associated with overweight males, Dr. Priemer notes "Just because you're a skinny woman doesn't mean you can't have it. Unfortunately there can be a misdiagnosis because a physician might say, 'Sorry, you don't fit the profile.' Obesity is indeed a major factor and there tends to be a higher incidence of sleep apnea among people who are obese."

Getting the condition diagnosed and treated is critical. In Ontario, physicians are obligated to inform the Ministry of Transportation if they have patients with sleep apnea and patients are at risk of losing their drivers' licences if their condition goes untreated.

Meet the man behind the scenes at the National Ballet of Canada

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

The graceful dancers at the National Ballet of Canada may be the artists who dazzle audiences, but no show could possibly be a success without the talented people working behind the scenes.

Ernie Abugov is at the apex of that esteemed group of people.

The ballet company's stage manager since 1973, Abugov has worked with such notable artistic directors as Celia Franca and Karen Kain and has travelled with the ballet group to such locations as Europe, Israel and the Far East.

"A stage manager is literally the person who runs the show backstage," says Abugov, who has taught theatre students at George Brown College.

"And that's what I love to do. That's my raison d'etre."

The veteran is slated to don his head set for the Spring Mixed Program which runs until May 14 and for the recent production of Romeo and Juliet which just finished.

"Romeo and Juliet, to me, is the ultimate story ballet," he relates.

"It's very fitting that we end our time at the Hummingbird Centre with Romeo and Juliet, because I think that's how we first started our show at the theatre, when it was called the O'Keefe Centre."

Abugov is particularly excited about the National Ballet's scheduled move to the new Four Seasons Centre for the Performing Arts for the 2006-07 season.

Ernie Abugov

"In a word, it's lovely," he enthuses about the new theatre.

Born in Montreal in 1947, Abugov wasn't raised to pursue a career in the arts.

"My dad [suggested]... I become an accountant," Abugov recalls.

"So, in my first year at Sir George Williams University (now Concordia), I was heading towards a bachelor of commerce thinking I was going to be an accountant. That lasted one year and I practically flunked out of school."

Switching gears, Abugov enrolled in general arts and found his calling in an elective class – drama/theatre 101.

'It's what I love to do'

"I got into the course in 1966 and spent 24/7 in the theatre," he says.

One of Abugov's teachers caught wind of the eager student's abilities and helped the up-and-coming, stage savvy teen score a gig working at Expo '67.

"I spent that summer at Expo working on all manner of shows," he reveals, noting this included thousands of puppet shows and a wild day and night working on a broadcast of the Ed Sullivan Show.

"We were there all night so I was beginning to pile up the overtime," Abugov says.

"At the end of Expo, I bought a BMW motorcycle."

Early success convinced Abugov that the stage was where he belonged, so he honed his craft diligently, including stints with Les Feux Follets, The Charlottetown Festival, La Poudrière Theatre and The Studio Lab Theatre, as well as touring with the famed performer Harry Belafonte.

Over the years, he's been involved in some wacky and humorous events, on and off the stage.

"At one ballet, the curtain was being blown a little bit awkward by the heating and ventilation system," Abugov relates.

"The electrician pushed a button and the curtain went up 10 feet and in front of everybody's eyes, it tore to smithereens and fell down on the stage."

Festival wraps up with naively optimistic film

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Seven years ago the Argentine-Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim and his close friend, Edward Said, the late Palestinian-American intellectual, jointly established an orchestra with talented young classical musicians from Israel, the Palestinian territories, Egypt, Lebanon and Syria.

Unable to meet in their home countries, the participants spent several summers making music in Spain, where the experience melted away longstanding mistrusts and forged a temporal cordiality among many of them. "Israelis, to me, were not human even," a Jordanian musician said, recalling his feelings before joining the group.

Under Barenboim's powerful and almost spell-casting baton, the West-Eastern Divan Orchestra unified into a cohesive unit and gave concerts in Europe, Morocco, Israel and the West Bank. The achievement earned Barenboim and Said a prestigious Spanish trophy, the Prince of Asturia award, for "improving understanding between nations."

Miracle in Krakow* is an eccentric romance set in Poland and Hungary and directed by Diana Groo.

Barenboim also received the Wolf Prize at the Israeli Knesset, but not without controversy. Upon hearing his politicized acceptance speech, cabinet minister Limor Livnat criticized him for using the Knesset podium "to attack the state of Israel" and expressed dismay that he had been honoured at all.

The Knesset award ceremony, which European filmmaker Paul Smaczny filmed as he tracked the orchestra's progress over five years, provides one of the few rancorous passages in this otherwise sugar-coated pill of a documentary, which at 91 minutes may be too large for some viewers to swallow.

Knowledge Is The Beginning purports to be about uniting young people of divergent nationalities and ideologies for the higher purpose of music, but politics is a strong sub-theme and the production, which is European-made, seems unfairly antagonistic to Israel. For example, it opens and ends by vilifying Israel's security fence – the so-called "Wall" – but presents only one side of the story.

Barenboim, who aroused strong feelings in 2001 by playing Wagner's music in Israel, receives high praise throughout for his dedication, patience, vision and inspiration; but since the film was co-produced by the Barenboim-Said Foundation, could it have been otherwise? Said, too, is given enormous homage. No attempt is made to counterbalance the voice of the notorious anti-Israel polemicist who was caught throwing stones in the intifadah and fabricating key sections of his autobiographical writings.

Knowledge Is The Beginning falls into a naively optimistic genre of film that has been well represented in Jewish film festivals since the Oslo peace accords of the mid-90s. According to the formula, Palestinian and Israeli are thrown together in some common project or purpose, and learn to tolerate and even like each other for the duration.

Now that Oslo is dust, now that Hamas reigns in the Palestinian territories, this cinematic genre no longer inspires hope and has become tiresome. In this light, Barenboim's peaceful overture falls flat and seems an undeserving subject for a film. Its best moments, highlighting the extraordinary musicality of a few gifted youngsters, are few and far between.

Knowledge Is The Beginning is being shown at the Bloor Cinema, Sunday, May 14, 9:30 p.m. as the festival's closing film.

The Polish town of Auschwitz is known primarily as the site of horrific Nazi death camps, and its previous history as a town with a once-thriving Jewish community comes as a surprise.

Stirred by an old storekeeper's eyewitness account and his precisely drawn map, Israeli Yariv Nornberg mounts an archeological expedition in search of some Torah scrolls and other artifacts buried beneath the floor of the Great Synagogue of Auschwitz before the Germans burned it to the ground.

Yahaly Ga's documentary A Treasure in Auschwitz (2005) engagingly chronicles this melancholic mission, which prompted the first site excavation of a Nazi-destroyed synagogue in Poland. As locals and visitors gather and excavators find and carefully lift the synagogue's old clay floor, a few old-timers recall the building's destruction more than six decades earlier.

Eye on Arts

PHOTOS SHOW GERMANY AT START OF NAZI ERA

A collection of some 18,000 photographs from the Klinsky Press Agency of prewar Europe have been donated anonymously to the Art Gallery of Ontario, which is planning an exhibit when its much-enlarged photographic galleries open next year.

Included among the rare photographs are more than 400 by renowned photographer Alfred Eisenstaedt, who photographed cultural activities and vivid moments in the lives of ordinary people for Berlin magazines in the '30s. His images drew attention to the nazification of German culture in 1933 and 1934; by 1935 the political climate forced him to immigrate to the United States, where he resumed his career with Life Magazine and other publications.

The Klinsky Press Agency operated in Amsterdam from the early '30s with the aim of visually chronicling a critical period in European history. Although the agency did not fall victim to Nazi rule immediately, many of the photographers who supplied it with images were Jewish and fled to Britain and the United States. The agency eventually closed but its inventory, stored outside of Amsterdam, remained intact for nearly 50 years.

"The core of the Klinsky Collection reveals a critical period of European history, with emphasis on 1930s Germany," said Maia-Mari Sutnik, the AGO's curator of photography. "The stark realism of the Klinsky Collection stands in sharp contrast to the manipulated images of the late 19th-century pictorialism."

Names in the News: Cringeworthy, a new play by Toronto actor-writer Alex Poch-Goldin, is a theatrical "yarn of deliciously dark proportions" and "a roller- coaster ride into the darkest of hearts." Cringeworthy is set in Edwardian London; Poch-Goldin plays the dastardly Mr. Cringeworthy, who torments the Tarantellas, a young married couple who owe him money.

Currently playwright-in-residence at Canstage, Poch-Goldin previously wrote This Hotel, which was Toronto's top-selling theatrical production in 2001, and Yahrzeit, which won a Toronto Jewish Playwriting Award. He's appeared in many films, television shows and stage productions, including Remnants and Angels in America.

Cringeworthy opens May 24 at Theatre Passe Muraille Main Space, 16 Ryerson St. (previews begin May 19) and runs through June 11. $25 to $30; previews $15; Sundays PWYC. 416-504-7529, www.artsboxoffice

Hot Docs festival showcases the finest documentary films

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Hot Docs, North America's largest documentary film festival, ended last week after screening 99 movies from 23 countries, including Canada and Israel.

The five films under review here range from a portrait of the Jewish settler community in Hebron – a flashpoint of Arab-Israeli tension – to a German Canadian's complex relationship with his father, who served in Nazi Germany's armed forces.

Shelley Saywell's 90-minute Canadian documentary, Martyr Street, focuses on the West Bank town of Hebron, where more than 100,000 Palestinian Arabs and several hundred Jewish settlers barely coexist.

Indeed, they view each other with unconcealed mutual suspicion and animosity, and occasionally, their conflict degenerates into outright violence.

Saywell made the film over a five-year period, visiting Hebron before and after the eruption of the latest Palestinian uprising. She concentrated her efforts on a once bustling market street that has become desolate and dangerous and, unfortunately, an apt metaphor of the sorry state of Arab-Jewish relations.

As Saywell correctly observes, Jews and Arabs lived together for hundreds of years in Hebron, a Jewish holy site. But with the 1929 Arab massacre of 67 Jews, things were never the same again. Jews returned to Hebron after the 1967 Six Day War, and today, Hebron is the only Arab town in the West Bank with a Jewish community.

In an attempt to understand the religious and political passions roiling Hebron, Saywell interviewed Jews and Arabs, who lead completely separate lives. One Jewish zealot tells her that he wants all Arabs to leave Hebron. Meanwhile, she reports that many Arab families left Martyr Street after vandals painted white Stars of David on their doors. Saywell also talks to two girls from the opposing camps who live next to each other but do not exchange words.

James Longley's vivid Iraq in Fragments portrays the disorder and chaos in contemporary Iraq through the eyes of ordinary Iraqis, including an impressively perceptive boy named Mohammed who works for his mercurial uncle.

This 94-minute film shows a country at war with itself as increasingly serious sectarian violence consumes the lives of Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds.

Divided into three parts to reflect Iraq's endemic ethnic divisions, the film leaves the impression that, from the Sunni and Shiite point of view, the United States invaded Iraq to secure oil supplies and steal its wealth, that the security situation in post-war Iraq is growing worse by the day, that Saddam Hussein exerted far more control than the Americans will ever be able to, and that the liberation of Iraq has turned into an occupation.

The Kurds, by contrast, appear pro-American, but they, too, are weary of the instability caused by the insurgency, which threatens Washington's nation-building project in Iraq.

There is at least one reference to the Kurds' yearning for self-determination. A Kurdish man plaintively asks why his people cannot be as independent and free as the Jews of Israel.

The images that flash across the screen are sharp and evocative. A U.S. helicopter gunship rattles overhead in a show of force. Shiites engage in bloody self-flagellation during a religious ceremony. A blind-folded man complains bitterly about the "new oppression" in Iraq. File footage of Iraq's oppression of the Kurds sends a shudder down one's spine.

Fatherland, by Manfred Becker, deals with the awful legacy of Adolf Hitler's Third Reich.

This sensitive 72-minute film, which will be broadcast on History Television on June 12 in honour of Father's Day, pits Becker, a German Canadian filmmaker, against his father, a veteran of Hitler's navy. Becker decides to return to his homeland and talk to his father about Nazi Germany after his son, Jonas, is branded a "Nazi" at school.

Now 86, Becker senior is a dyed-in-the-wool conservative. He claims that the Weimar Republic was a "pigsty" and that Hitler united Germany and imbued it with renewed pride. He denies knowledge of Kristallnacht and cannot believe that Germans could have conceived the Holocaust and commited war crimes. He recants after meeting an old Jewish family friend, a refugee from Nazi Germany.

Becker, the director of the film, equates German patriotism with shame and classifies his father as a member of a lost generation that tarnished Germany's name and reputation.

Charting a course somewhere between his father and grandfather, Jonas expresses annoyance over his father's insistence on German guilt. In the end, Becker is ironically the only one in the family who can't let go of the past.

•••

Jack Silberman's National Film Board of Canada presentation, Raised to be Heroes, profiles a group of Israelis, from high school students ready to be inducted into the army to officers in the reserves, who refuse to serve in the territories on the grounds that it perpetuates Israel's occupation.

Silberman also interviews Noam Kaminer, a soldier who received four consecutive 28-day jail sentences for his defiance, and David Zonshine, an officer who once performed his duties without questioning their validity.

Raised to be Heroes underscores the fact that Israel's policies do not meet with the approval of some of its citizens.

Anna's Summer has an aura of mystery

Some Jewish artifacts are uncovered, including crumbling pages of a prayer book and some synagogue lamps, but so are some Nazi artifacts, such as a helmet and gas mask. The Torahs never surface.

While the dig's Israeli organizers are sad at the end of the story, the Polish archeologists are exultant, since the bits and pieces they recovered are "like a voice" for the lost synagogue. Gat's subtitled documentary has more to do with the current Jewish impulse to retrieve and breathe new life into the past than with the adjacent death camps, which are peripheral to the story.

The screening takes place at the Bloor Cinema, Thursday May 11, 1 p.m.

Inhabited by ghosts, a beautiful old house on a sun-drenched Greek isle is the setting for director Jeanine Meerapfel's meditative, beautifully photographed drama Anna's Summer, in which stories from the past overshadow those of the present.

Mourning for her late partner Max, Anna (nicely played by Angela Molina) inherits the large family home but must search through ancestral papers of her Sephardi family for the title deed necessary to sell the property. As she roots through the past, the spirits of her husband, parents and grandparents visit her and replay key scenes of their lives. Anchoring her to the present is her love affair with Nikola, one of the young workmen fixing up the property for sale.

Dreamlike and beguiling, Anna's Summer evokes a strongly Mediterranean atmosphere as well as questions about its overall meaning. It seems more sketch than full story, but its aura of mystery only adds to its charm.

Daniel Barenboim in *Knowledge is the Beginning.

***

A mystical Jewish book called the Silver Crown is the "pumpkin" – the object that drives the narrative and is the focus of everybody's search – at the centre of Miracle In Cracow; this eccentric romance from Hungarian director Diana Groo. Set in the Jewish quarters of Budapest and Krakow, the film spins an improbable tale of two young people, Eszter and Piotr, who need the book for their own reasons. Among other marvels, the book is supposed to contain the kabbalistic secret for bringing the dead back to life.

Eszter's and Piotr's overlapping journey takes them eventually to the darkly romantic figure of an old world rabbi: it's as though these modern Jewish psyches need some good old-fashioned Jewish mysticism (a la the legendary Rabbi Levi of 16th-century Krakow) in order to make their spirits whole again. Filmmaker Groo has said that she loaded the film with personal memories of her own Jewish merchant family; her maternal grandparents had an enormous library in Krakow. "The reason why [Miracle in Cracow] features a Jewish rabbi, the Kabbala, the Jewish district in Krakow and District 7 in Budapest is that it's in me," she said in a recent interview. "This is what I've been interested in my whole life."

First-of-its-kind Israeli art show

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A road show highlighting the multi-faceted talents of Israeli artists passed through Toronto last week.

Israeli Art Source, a private consortium representing some of Israel's finest painters and sculptors, showcased original works as well as reproductions.

Their pieces were exhibited at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre and the Koffler Centre of the Arts at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre from May 2-8.

Partially sponsored by Israel's Ministry of Industry and Trade, the show was the first of its kind in Canada and was designed to promote the full spectrum of Israeli art, said Gabi Regev, Israel's deputy trade commissioner in Toronto.

Yossi Porat, an Israeli Art Source official and publisher of art books, said the organization represents more than 70 artists and five galleries.

The exhibition, jointly opened by Israeli Consul General Ya'acov Brosh and Trade Commissioner Ephraim Shoham, was a showcase for artists such as Isaac Maimon, Dorit Levi, Sonia Drabkin and Samy Briss.

But the show, fresh from an appearance in the United States, also featured the works of internationally famous Jewish artists Amedeo Modigliani and Marc Chagall.

Prices ranged from $200 to $5,000. The show did a fairly brisk business, said Porat, the proprietor of an art gallery in Rishon Lezion. Thirty out of 100 pieces had been sold by May 4.

Yuval Mahler's *Dancers

The brash and satirical acrylic and metal sculptures by Yuval Mahler explored human relationships and appealed to the child in us all.

In sharp contrast to Mahler's playful sculptures, the oil paintings of Arieh Azene were studies of the colourful canvas chairs once found on the beach in Tel Aviv.

Meanwhile, the serigraphs of Gregory Kohelet paid homage to the Middle Eastern architecture of old Jerusalem, while the canvases of Michael Gorban focused on light playing on flower arrangements.

There were also the classics – Modigliani's moody Portrait of a Woman with Hat and Chagall's uplifting The Three Candles.

Travels with Kolel

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein leads two brand-new learning trips to Israel. " Israel 101," is geared to first-timers or those who have been away a long time. It includes many of the famous sites, new archeological finds, off-the-beaten-track surprises and learning. Travel dates are Jan. 21 to 30, 2007. Free information night, May 16, 7:30 p.m. at Kolel, 151 Eglinton Ave. W.

Kolel's Exodus Tour to Egypt to Israel (March 29 to Apr. 10, 2007) starts in Cairo, where tour participants say kaddish at the Pyramids. They also walk into Israel on Erev Pesach for a seder in a desert tent. The tour continues with camels, jeeps, climbing and other family-bonding activities. Free information night at Kolel, June 6, 7:30 p.m.

Amanda's lemonade stand aids Heart & Stroke

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

An eight-year-old Toronto girl did it again, fundraising thousands of dollars for the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario's annual Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for the Heart, which takes place on June 8.

"We [had] pony rides, balloons, hot chocolate and popcorn and an auction – a silent auction and a live auction," said Amanda Belzowski, talking about her eighth annual Lemonade Stand, which drew approximately 250 people on May 7 and raised $7,718.16.

Amanda, a third-grade student at United Synagogue Day School, has helped raise more than $30,000 for the Heart and Stroke Foundation since 1999, when she was just a toddler.

"All you have to do is think of how you're going to raise the money, then pick a charity, and people will probably come out, cause all these causes are really good causes," she said.

Amanda's grandmother, as well as her great-grandfather, both received artificial aortic valve replacements.

"Heart [conditions] and strokes affect everybody. The Heart and Stroke Foundation is an easy charity to raise money for because [of this fact]," said Lisa Belzowski, Amanda's mother.

"There hasn't been anyone that hasn't been touched, be it a family member or a friend, or somebody with something to do with Heart and Stroke."

At her fundraiser, Amanda, along with her 11-week-old brother, Joshua, offered lemonade, hot chocolate and a variety of entertainment and activities from 11 a.m. until 2 p.m.

Amanda's annual event has captured the attention of Donald Trump, who wrote her a letter last year, praising her efforts.

"I'm hoping to meet Donald Trump one day. I invite him almost every year," she said.

An autographed photo of Donald Trump was auctioned off this year for $80, along with items from the Toronto Raptors, toys from Mega Bloks and Disney artwork from Animation Connection. About 30 businesses contributed to Amanda's fundraiser.

The carnival-like event featured popular children's performer Dan the Music Man, and world-renowned balloon artist Kenton Kruger. Other highlights included personalized button-making by Star World Entertainment, pony rides from Lionel's Pony Farm and new this year was Dippin Dots ice cream provided by Party Props.

"It is a blast – you would not believe what goes on, on their front lawn" said Elissa Freemon, director of public relations and public affairs for the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario.

"I love the carnival atmosphere. I love that people feel good about going, I love that people feel good about giving to a worthy cause and also just creates so much fun and excitement."

Freemon said fundraisers like Amanda's are necessary since the foundation depends entirely on donations for research. "What's important is that Amanda's creating awareness through the lemonade stand. She's got information there that the public can pick up and learn more about heart disease and stroke. It's twofold – fundraising and awareness."

Amanda's mother stressed the importance of teaching children the value of tzedakah.

"It's important to teach them to give back and to teach them to help out when they can. It's an important thing we should all know and there is no reason to wait until a certain age [to begin the lesson]," Belzowski said.

According to the Heart and Stroke Foundation, heart disease kills more Canadians each year than any other illness and 80 per cent of Canadians have at least one risk factor for heart disease.

Girl donates hair to Locks of Love

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

When it comes to preteens or teenagers and hair, it's very hard to think of one without the other.

That makes the sacrifice of 11-year-old Lauren Schoenberg, a Grade 6 student at Hamilton Hebrew Academy, even more impressive.

In memory of her grandfather and great-grandmother, who both died of cancer, she decided to cut 12 inches off her luxuriant brunette hair and donate it to Locks of Love.

She got the idea, her father Jacques said, from someone she knew who did the same thing.

Locks of Love, a non-profit organization based in Florida, collects donations of hair to make wigs for financially disadvantaged children with medical hair loss, such as from cancer or alopecia areata.

But donating her hair wasn't enough for Lauren. She prepared a dvar Torah explaining what she did that she presented to students in grades 5 to 8 at her school

In it, she asked for donations of money to help in cancer research, and she asked them to join her in other tzedakah projects.

The nearly 200 students at the school – which, her father said, is "like a family" – brought in $300, which was donated to the Canadian Cancer Society.

Lauren's other tzedakah suggestions to the students included going to Shalom Village, a housing project in Hamilton for the elderly; giving to the food bank; and contributing lunches to the Out of the Cold program.

Lauren Schoenberg and the 12 inches of hair she donated to Locks of Love.

"The money that I am sending to cancer research will also help put an end to that dreadful disease that kills thousands of people every year," she said in the moving conclusion to her presentation. "I know, because my grandfather and my great-grandmother passed away to cancer and I don't want it touching the lives of my loved ones any more."

For more information on Locks for Love, write 2925 10th Ave. N., Suite 102, Lake Worth, Fla. 33461, or visit www.locksoflove.org.

Groups for disabled unite

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Two Vaughan-based charitable organizations that support people with developmental disabilities have joined forces to raise money and find new ways to serve their clients.

Reena, the second largest provider of comprehensive support services to people with developmental disabilities in Ontario, and Alternatives, a grassroots organization founded in 1998 by parents of young adults with developmental disabilities, held a kosher fundraising dinner recently at the Terrace Banquet Centre in Vaughan.

Vaughan mayor Michael Di Biase, honorary chair of the event, called the Together We Belong gala, said in an interview that he takes much pride in the initiative "because two very worthy non-profit charities are bringing their staff and volunteers together in a spirit of co-operation to share some of their history and some of the selflessness of their work."

The two organizations originally joined forces, he said, because funding is a problem for every charity and the two decided to see what they could do together.

"As I worked with Sandy Keshen [Reena president and CEO] and Phyllis Santone [founder of Alternatives], in planning the dinner, I saw very positive results," he said.

"These organizations have clearly benefited from new friendships, new alliances and new relationships. Reena and Alternatives are now sharing ideas, and they are sharing programming ideas which will further benefit children and young people."

Reena chair Carolynn Morrison said her organization welcomes every opportunity to partner with other agencies.

"Although the delivery of our services might vary, we are working toward a common goal to provide the best possible services and programs for our clients."

There are a number of residential homes in Vaughan that clients have been welcomed into, and under Di Biase's leadership, the city has provided them with meaningful employment opportunities that have added value to their lives, Morrison said.

Israeli hockey: on ice, not so good; off ice, better

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There's good news and there's bad news on the Israeli hockey front.

First the bad news. The Israelis were, how to put it delicately, clobbered and pummeled – or maybe clummeled – in five games against Division I opponents in a recent International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) tournament in Amiens, France.

The best the 0-5 Israelis could do was limit Japan to a 7-1 margin and put two pucks past tournament champion Germany, which allowed only four goals in five games. As a result of finishing last, Israel has been relegated to Division II.

That's the bad news. The good news: the food was really good in France.

OK, that's not really the good news.

Although the Israeli skaters were humbled in France – a result that was far from unexpected – there were plenty of positive off-ice developments to put a smile on Alan Maislin's face.

Sticking to their opponents was not enough for Israel in this 11-2 loss to Germany.

Maislin, chair of the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel (IHFI), professed satisfaction that the country's hockey program managed to even get to a Division I tournament in the first place – he called the calibre of play one level below the NHL – but at the same time, off-ice developments portend well for the future of the Israeli program.

Right around the time the Israelis were tuning up for the IIHF experience with a training camp in Prague, news was released, albeit prematurely, that a deal had been completed that will see construction of an ice centre in the heart of Israel, just north of Tel Aviv. The 5,000-seat winter sports centre will include two rinks – one Olympic-size, the other of NHL dimensions – plus an inline skating facility. The $15 million (US) project in Hod Hasharon, to be built by anonymous private investors from the United States and Canada, is scheduled to open by the end of 2007.

A second off-ice development concerns an international hockey tournament the Israelis could actually win – a resurrected Maccabiah Games event in Israel.

During the IIHF tournament in Amiens, Maislin made contact with two Jewish players on the French national team and got their co-operation to put together a French team for a proposed tournament at the Maccabiah.

Twin brothers Maurice and Francois Rozenthal, 31, told Maislin there are enough Jewish players in France to ice a credible team, should hockey return to the Maccabiah Games.

Hockey has been a Maccabiah sport on only one occasion, in 1997, when Canada was joined by the United States, Israel and Ukraine for a series of games in the Canada Center complex in Metulla. Stocked with ex-pros, AHL, college and junior players, Canada won the tournament handily.

Maislin believes there may also be enough decent Jewish players in Holland and Sweden to ice two additional teams, and with France in and Ukraine out (possibly), there could be six teams competing in Hod Hasharon and Metulla at the next Maccabiah Games in 2009.

Maislin said he has yet to bring his suggestion to Maccabi World Union officials. He was still in the early stages of determining whether there was interest among a sufficient number of countries to bring winter sports, including figure skating, to the Games.

Regardless of hockey's inclusion in the Maccabiah, Maislin is committed to developing the sport in Israel. The proposed new rink in Hod Hasharon "is critical for the [hockey] association in Israel," he said.

To be located in the heart of Israel, the rink gives hockey organizers the population base on which to build a viable development program.

"The potential is unlimited," he said.

Israel already has more than 95 inline skating teams, and these young athletes could make a natural transition to ice hockey. In addition, there is a population base of about one million Russian immigrants to draw from, as well as other expats and sabras who enjoy the sport.

"I think Israelis will come to the sport," Maislin said, pointing to the junior team, which consists largely of native Israelis who first were exposed to hockey in their homeland.

Maislin, who resides in Montreal, said another element of the hockey development program is the search for "conveners" to organize leagues at the new rinks. Other items aimed at improving the calibre of play in Israel include a summer camp in Metulla from July 23 to 29 and a coaching development program put together by former NHL coach Pierre Page.

The summer camp, which was pioneered by the late Roger Neilson, will be run by Israeli national team coach Jean Perron and former NHLer Steve Dubinsky. Sean Skinner, a skills specialist who contracts to a number of NHL teams, will also participate.

On this side of the ocean, Israeli hockey organizers will hold a tryout camp in Toronto for players eligible to play for Israel.

In October, Israel's junior team will embark on an eight city North American tour, with stops in Chicago, Los Angeles, Florida, Philadelphia, New York, New Jersey, Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto.

All these developments give Maislin reason to hope that the next time the Israelis get to Division I, they'll perform much better.

As he explained to his players in Amiens, "You earned the right to get here. You beat five teams to get here. Now you know what it takes to stay here."

Maccabi Tel Aviv loses Euroleague final, but fans emerge as winners

By DINAH A. SPRITZER
JTA

PRAGUE — For four days recently, there were possibly more Jews in the Czech capital than at any time since World War II.

They were so full of joy, bursting into song in the Old Town or trading shirts and pins with tourists, that many natives wondered how such a large group of mostly male visitors could be so well-behaved.

Swathed in yellow, head to toe with yellow shirts, hats and face paint, the new Jews in town were 10,000 to 15,000 Israelis who flew in to cheer for what was, until then, the best basketball team in the European League. And even though Maccabi Tel Aviv, with its yellow and blue uniforms, was defeated by CSKA Moscow in a close game in the Euroleague final, the impression made by the fans will last a while.

Their team was a loser, but by all accounts, the Israeli fans were winners.

"This is not what we are used to in sports fans," observed Martina Kucerova, a Prague sportswriter who worked during the Final Four at Sazka Arena, the venue for the tournament. "They don't get drunk, they don't get aggressive, they are just happy and fun. It's so refreshing."

Instead of the belligerent and often drunk carousing associated with European hockey or soccer fans, you could find the Israelis singing everything from Hatikvah to Maccabi team songs and exchanging memorabilia with fans of the other three teams in the championship, including the Russian squad that denied them this year's championship.

Sazka stadium holds 18,000 spectators, and in the semi-finals and finals in which Maccabi participated, more than 80 per cent of the seats were filled with yellow-and-blue-clad Israelis who sang, clapped and danced for the entire game.

Frantisek Bouc, a veteran Czech sportswriter, said organizers were hoping Maccabi would make it to the finals.

"It's known all around Europe that they have some of the most loyal fans," he said.

"There is no other European basketball team that can generate such a following," said Iren Harel of Kfar Saba.

Dedication to the team comes also from a desire to focus on something positive and unifying "when there are so many political and security issues that trouble Israelis," Harel said. It was an opinion endorsed by many other fans during the weekend tournament.

After Maccabi won its semi-final, 500 Israelis made their way to the Hilton to welcome Shabbat with Chabad. In a city with only 1,500 registered members of the Jewish community, and typically no more than 200 at any religious event, the spontaneous singing and dancing in the Hilton entry hall was a unique spectacle.

"We came from the March of the Living," an annual visit to the sites of Nazi concentration camps in Poland, "and I cannot think of a greater and more wonderful contrast than to watch this celebration," said Sylvia Camlot of Montreal, a hotel guest.

At the Shabbat dinner, chants of "Moshiach, moshiach" – messiah, messiah – were interspersed with "tzahov, tzahov," or yellow, in honour of Maccabi.

The Shabbat event was held thanks to Ya'acov Globerman, reportedly the only rabbi in Israel closely associated with a sports team. He is the rabbi of Maccabi coach Pini Gershon, who met him three years ago at a Chabad class that teaches the basics of Judaism to secular Jews.

Maccabi fans range from Orthodox to secular. One fan from Tel Aviv, Ziv Rafalovitz, said more observant Jews are beginning to follow basketball because of Rabbi Globerman's celebrity status.

"We'll be in Athens next year," said a slightly dejected Oren Rosenberg of Tel Aviv, sweating through the yellow-and-blue paint on his cheeks after the game ended "For sure at the finals."

Media literacy training should start early

ARTS IN FOCUS
By Oren Shefa

Never before have children been as shamelessly manipulated by the devious marketing tactics of media conglomerates peddling their wares as they are today.

There is literally nowhere urban youth can turn to find relief from the constant barrage of targeted advertisements. Multinational corporations design bold strategies that involve reaching children as young as six months old, and yet, to date, media literacy courses and lessons are only introduced in most Canadian school curricula around Grade 10. It has, therefore, become increasingly important for parents to take matters into their own hands by making use of the many resources available on media awareness in order to educate their children as early as possible.

The Media Awareness Network (MNet), a Canadian not-for-profit that assists parents and teachers in educating children, is one of the largest organizations of its kind in the world. Established in 1996, MNet monitors television viewing times and Internet usage among children and teens across Canada. The intention is to make parents and teachers aware of not only the health risks associated with overexposure to media, but to highlight the excessive amounts of youth-targeted advertising by companies that see children as nothing more than mindless consumers in waiting.

According to MNet, between 1990 and 2000, youth-targeted advertising increased by more than 20 times to more than $2 billion dollars annually. Commercials, billboards, product placements in films, music videos and the Internet, and celebrity endorsements are but a few of the tools that advertisers use to reach young shoppers. The hope is that by filling children with the desire for popular brand names, they will use what MNet calls "pester power" on their parents. But by taking action at an early age, MNet's mission statement suggests, parents can help children "to become more savvy as consumers and more resistant to the pressures to be 'cool.'"

The good news is that the information needed to protect and educate children is readily available. The MNet website lists a plethora of resources for parents and teachers, including tip-sheets, statistics, surveys and step-by-step lesson plans. Starting education at an early age – by explaining how marketing works, talking to children about misleading phrases and giving them basic lessons in money management – is crucial.

But even with the amount of information available for anyone with the incentive to seek it out, nothing can replace the impact and importance of introducing media studies in the classrooms at a much earlier age than is currently the case. Understanding media and marketing should not be elective education for the interested few, as media and marketing have become so prevalent and have such enormous influence over children. To delay teaching kids about the effects of media and marketing on the way they perceive the world is irresponsible.

Companies are all about, and always will be about, the bottom line. Without effective ad campaigns targeting the right groups, products won't sell and companies will falter. We can't expect, therefore, that businesses will find a conscience and reassess some of the morally reprehensible tactics they use to reach children. At the same time, there is no indication, at this point, that media awareness will be introduced into the elementary school curriculum any time soon. Without active parental involvement in the early stages of childhood development, getting kids to re-examine their consumer habits once they enter high school could prove to be very difficult.

Grilled Chicken Caesar Salad

- 1 1/2 lb skinless boneless chicken breast halves
- 1/2 cup olive oil
- 1 tsp salt
- 3/4 tsp black pepper
- 2 garlic cloves, smashed
- 3 tblsps fresh lemon juice
- 2 tsps Dijon mustard
- 1 tsp anchovy paste
- 2 (10-oz) packages hearts of romaine
- 1 1/2 cups croutons

Brush chicken with 1 tblsp oil, then sprinkle with 1/2 tsp salt, 1/4 tsp pepper. Grill chicken, turning over once, about 15 min. While chicken grills, blend garlic, lemon juice, mustard, anchovy paste, remaining salt and pepper in a blender until combined. With motor running, add remaining oil in a slow stream, blending until emulsified. Transfer chicken to cutting board and cut into 1/2" thick slices. Toss chicken with 2 tblsp. dressing in a large bowl. Add romaine, remaining dressing, and croutons and toss. Makes 4 servings.

A plea for faith-based schools

Guest Voice

Below is an edited letter from Eric Lawee, associate professor of humanities at York University, to four Ontario Liberal MPPs, including MP Lorenzo Berardinetti, who recently endorsed petitions that praised Ontario's Liberal government for "implementing a positive plan to improve our public schools" while criticizing Opposition leader John Tory for wanting "to take millions from public education to literally pay people to withdraw their children from the public system and send them to elite private schools."

Dear Mr. Berardinetti,

I read the petition on school funding that you endorsed with considerable pain.

I do not send my children to "elite private schools." I send them to faith-based schools with potholes for playgrounds.

I do so for the same reason Premier Dalton McGuinty's parents sent their children to Catholic schools: because I want my children to combine the best of a democratic-liberal education with the best of a faith-based one.

The only difference between me and the McGuintys is our faith. Unfortunately, for my kids, that makes a big difference. While your leader and 93 per cent of the families who use faith-based schools in Ontario get a first-class education for their kids for free, my kids, though blessed with fine and dedicated teachers, get a lesser education than their Catholic friends and neighbours – and one that practically bankrupts my family – because we use the seven per cent of faith-based schools that get no government support.

I know you support public schools. So do I. Indeed, I teach at a public university, where I help to train the next generation of public school teachers. I'm not rich. I'm just trying to raise my kids the best way I know how, just like the McGuintys raised Dalton. Among families who send children to non-Catholic faith-based schools, I don't know a single person who doesn't want a strong public school system. Many, like myself, are products of public schools. But we also want fairness, and we can't understand how a party bearing the name "Liberal" not only denies it to us, but seems to revel in denying it to us. So, even as we support the public school system, we are angry that our children are short-changed. Wouldn't you be if you passed by new public and Catholic schools full of better-salaried teachers, fuller libraries and more decent gym equipment, only to drop your children off at a more run-down building with far fewer resources?

I'm not your constituent, so perhaps you can afford to ignore me, and even to score political points by painting my children's schools as "elite" when they are not, and by pretending that the Conservatives want to fund elite private schools when they merely seek to end discrimination against a few of Ontario's minority faith communities.

Even so, can you explain to me how a liberal – with a small "l" – can at once denounce discrimination while voting for it? Or how a sense of liberal fairness allows you to deny to seven per cent of Ontario's faith-based schoolchildren what 93 per cent of them already have?

Would you discriminate against my family when it comes to our health care, or the use of public roads? And if not, then why can you support discrimination when it comes to what your party has rightly stressed is so important: our kids' education?

Finally, if you can't explain your position – because it is so clearly unfair, not to mention subversive of our obligations under international treaty, as the United Nations has ruled – won't you rethink your position, and help us instead of demonizing us, not because it will win you votes, but because it's the right thing to do?

If you do, I, and thousands of other Ontarians, will be in your debt.

More importantly, you will have our children's gratitude.

URBAN WRITER will return

Transatlantic rift looming on Iran?

By WILLIAM ECHIKSON
JTA

After the acrimony over policy on Iraq, the next challenge for the United States and Europe is Iran.

This time, the transatlantic partners are working better together, agreeing to seek a United Nations Security Council resolution demanding that Tehran stop its nuclear program. Both say the next step could be sanctions against the Islamic republic.

Analysis

So far, so good – but what happens if the Security Council can't reach an agreement? Negotiations are continuing this week in New York on a British and French draft resolution that opens the possibility of stiff punishment of Iran.

On May 16, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was to meet with the foreign ministers of the four other permanent members of the Security Council – Britain, China, France and Russia – and Germany for discussions on Iran. But both China and Russia are hesitating to sign a tough resolution, raising the real possibility of a deadlock.

If that happens, European and American leaders who met recently in Brussels at a German Marshall Fund (GMF) conference on transatlantic relations underlined how the transatlantic harmony painstakingly reconstructed in the past few years could vanish.

The GMF is a nonpartisan U.S. public policy and grant-making institution whose goal is to promote greater co-operation and understanding between the United States and Europe. The conference underlined how far the two sides have come – and how they could still diverge.

The News in Brief

Canada

Website Pulled

TORONTO — A Farsi-language website that recruited suicide bombers and offered a link to Hamas' website has been removed. It was pulled after the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center contacted Groupe iWeb Technologies, a Montreal Internet Service Provider (ISP), and asked it to terminate the website for violating Canadian laws and the ISP's code of conduct. The site was operated by a registrant from Iran and according to IranPressNews, it began operation in mid-February in the United States under the auspices of the global Islamic suicide-bombers security brigade. It was pulled by its American ISP but appeared to have found a new host in Canada until its removal last week.

June Hate Trial Set

MONTREAL — A Montreal man will go on trial June 12 to 16 in Quebec Court for creating and operating a racist website that included cartoons hostile to Jews and blacks, images of swastika tattoos and Nazi-themed video games. Jean-Sebastien Presseault, 29, was arrested in 2003 and is charged under the hate propaganda section of the Criminal Code. His site, which was still online this month, praises right-wing U.S. extremist Timothy McVeigh, who was executed for the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing. Presseault's lawyer said the court has no jurisdiction, since the site's host is in the United States, but the Crown said a Canadian court can intervene because the site was run from Montreal.

BMO Gives $750,000

WINNIPEG — Tony Comper, president and CEO of BMO Financial Group, presented $750,000 last week to Gail Asper of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights campaign. Asper has raised more than $60 million in donations and $140 million from government sources for the $311-million project, slated to open in 2010.

World

Neo-fascist in Cabinet

WARSAW — Roman Giertych, who leads a party linked to anti-Semitism, was named Poland's education minister last week. His League of Polish Families, which joined the governing coalition last week, has its roots in Endecja, the ultra-nationalist party his grandfather led in the 1930s that was one of the most anti-Semitic political groups in Europe. Giertych is honorary chair of the All-Polish Youth, a skinhead group whose members have been seen giving Nazi salutes. In the 1930s, it led attacks on Jewish students.

Times Editor Dies

NEW YORK — A.M. Rosenthal, the longtime executive editor of the New York Times who became a staunch defender of Israel in later years, died May 10 at 84. He is credited with revitalizing the Times during his tenure as executive editor from 1977 to 1986. After Rosenthal retired as editor, he often addressed Israel and anti-Semitism in his twice-weekly column for the Times. The son of a Russian Jewish immigrant, he was born Abraham Michael Rosenthal in Canada.

Yiddish Actress Dies

NEW YORK — A leading Yiddish actress, Luba Kadison Buloff, died May 4 in New York at 99. She played countless roles in eastern Europe and then New York for decades, including Willy Loman's wife in the Yiddish production of Arthur Miller's Death of a Salesman, and often co-starred with husband Joseph Buloff.

Berenstain Bears Encounter Civilization

OTTAWA — The children's interactive exhibit "Growing Up With the Berenstain Bears" will open at the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Gatineau, Que., May 27 and continue through August.

The Berenstain Bears

The show is based on the illustrated children's book series created by Americans Stan and Jan Berenstain. The couple produced more than 200 Berenstain Bears books starting in 1962, which have sold more than 150 million copies. The books follow the everyday life of a typical suburban family – of bears.

Visitors enter the Berenstain Tree House and join Mama, Papa, Brother and Sister Bear on a "paws-on" adventure in Bear Country. The couple's son Mike Berenstain, a co-author and illustrator on the series, will attend the exhibit's opening weekend to present readings and sketch demonstrations.

Since Stan's death last November at 82, Mike and Jan have continued to create new books. The family was inspired by the Berenstain household in suburban Philadelphia.

In his 2002 autobiography, Down a Sunny Dirt Road, Stan wrote about growing up Jewish in a lower-class Philadelphia neighbourhood.

Girl, 11, names newly discovered micro-organism

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

An 11-year-old Toronto girl is the co-winner of a "Name a New Species Contest" sponsored by Maple Tree Press

Hannah Walsh, a Grade 6 student at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, was one of more than 1,000 children from seven to 15 who entered the contest, which required naming a newly discovered salt-loving halophile microorganism. Her submission of "salsolis" ("sal" is the Latin for salt and "solis" is sun) was also entered by eight-year-old Duncan Uszkay of Oakville.

"I was reading OWL magazine and at the back there was an advertisement for a contest and it was to name a new species of halophiles, which is a creature that loves salt and sun, so I decided to try and enter and see what would happen," said Hannah. "I didn't think I would win. But I did."

The contest, which ran from November 2005 to March 2006, was open to children across Canada as well as the United States.

"I thought it was pretty cool to be able to name a new species," said Hannah, who in 2003 won The CJN's Purim drawing contest. "I knew that animals had scientific names that are mostly Latin. I used an online dictionary to search for things for what [the organism] likes the most, salt and sun."

Hannah Walsh

Hannah said it took her about 10 minutes to come up with the appropriate name, which she constructed entirely on her own. The newly named salsolis flourishes in water 10 times saltier than the sea and is completely resistant to ultraviolet rays.

Hannah's father, Bob Walsh, was surprised by the news of her win.

"Carol [Hannah's mother] and I didn't even know until she said, 'Hey, I won the contest,'" said Walsh.

"We said, 'Well, what contest?' She did it completely by herself. She likes to do things on her own. She's independently minded that way."

Walsh is incredibly impressed by Hannah's achievement.

"We're very proud, as you might imagine. It's really kind of neat that by naming a species, you've made your mark in a way," he said.

Can you afford to get old?

As the sandwich generation, we see ourselves struggling to deal with the aging cycle of our parents and grandparents – the mental deterioration, the physical decline and the financial challenges that arise. When it's your time, do you want to leave your children in such a position?

We all know there is minimal governmental support for long-term care needs. The Ontario Long Term Care Association estimates the cost of room and board at a nursing facility can range from $16,000 to $25,000 a year depending on the type of accommodation. Your long-term care needs can be funded by your life savings or through a Long Term Care Insurance plan

You don't want your children's savings to be eaten up because of you. Call us today to set an appointment to discuss your future care

Editors meet again in Jerusalem

From the editor's desk

When Yasser Arafat launched his war of terrorism against Israel in October 2000, one of his aims was to bring Israeli society to its knees. Murder by suicide bombers would be too much for the Jewish society whose abiding concern for human life, Arafat believed, was also its Achilles heel.

But Arafat was wrong. Spectacularly so.

Israel suffered horribly from the unprecedentedly cruel campaign of wanton killing of civilian men, women and children. The slaughter was ghoulish. And the grief was great.

But Israeli society did not collapse. Once the nature and extent of Arafat's war was understood, Israel retrenched.

With resolve unmatched anywhere in the western world, Israelis reinvigorated the battle in defence of their lives and their homeland and resumed normal life. It will be to the everlasting credit of Israeli society that it did not collapse, either in panic, hysteria or hatred, under the weight of such existentially searing, frequent mourning.

But it will not be to the everlasting credit of those of us in far-away lands who, because of the terrorism and violence, did not visit the Jewish state between 2000 and 2005. Sometimes it is important to rise above our fears. In the main, however, we did not do so.

Prior to 2000, the World Zionist Organization sponsored and arranged a biannual gathering in Jerusalem of Jewish journalists from around the world. The gatherings achieved two very important results: they provided journalists an opportunity to explore and discuss many of the key issues of the day in a deeper, more comprehensive manner; and they provided an opportunity for journalists to meet new colleagues, share information, exchange ideas, relate to common concerns and establish friendships.

But Arafat's intifadah brought an end to the biannual gatherings. Too few journalists signed up for them. They slipped, eventually, into the category of good memories and things that were good while they lasted.

Last week, however, those good memories of pre-intifadah gatherings of Jewish journalists were revived. Through the efforts of the Israel Press Service and Samin Public Relations in Jerusalem, 27 editors from four continents met in Israel to resume the gatherings and start anew the discussions of years earlier.

The five-day conference began on May 7. The CJN was part of a diverse group that included editors from Australia, Austria, Canada, Croatia, the Czech Republic, Israel, Italy, New Zealand, South Africa, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Dan Panorama Hotel in Jerusalem was our base. From that pleasant, well-located hotel in central Jerusalem, we travelled on different days south to the Negev, west to Tel Aviv and north to Nazareth, in search of new stories and memorable experiences. We succeeded in finding both.

The program was excellent, if exhausting, and featured in typical Israeli style, no holds-barred presentations by the many people with whom our group met. Over the next few issues, I will record some of its highlights in this space and introduce readers to an editor who flew from Sweden to participate in the conference.

* * *

After registration and introductions, we travelled to where the view of Jerusalem is breathtaking, to Hebrew University on Mount Scopus.

We ate dinner with students from overseas, including three Canadians from Toronto, Hamilton and Victoria, and listened to Prof. Menachem Magidor, president of the university, and to Prof. Robert Aumann, the recent Nobel Prize laureate in economics.

Magidor wanted primarily to introduce the group to the history and present contributions of the university. The university is known far and wide. "It is Israel's most important research institution," he told us, "rooted in Jewishness, excellence, scientific and scholarly research."

As an illustration of the university's far-reaching influence, Magidor told us that some 25 members of the faculty of agriculture at the University of Beijing are graduates of Hebrew University.

He pointedly told us that one of his chief concerns for Israeli society is for its "Jewishness." He clarified his use of the term, not in a demographic sense, but in a deeper sense involving all aspects of its culture, learning and society.

Magidor was the first to speak openly with us. Indeed, all the people with whom we would subsequently meet conveyed only unvarnished opinions.

In direct contrast to Magidor's opinion, though, Aumann said, "Jewishly, we are doing okay. Democratically, we are not." He was expressing his deep disappointment with the public excoriation of a soldier the week before who had refused to shake the hand of the chief of staff while accepting a medal for service beyond the call of duty at a ceremony at the president's residence. The soldier could not, in good conscience, shake the hand of the chief of staff who had directed the removal of settlers from Gush Katif last summer; his family had been among them.

When asked, however, what had been, for him, the most moving moment of the Nobel Prize ceremony, he answered: "Seeing the Israeli flag fluttering next to the Swedish flag."

More next week from the International Conference of Jewish Newspaper Editors, May 7-11, 2006, in Jerusalem.

Israelis committed to more withdrawals: analyst

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's recent election underscored the fact that a clear majority of Israelis are committed to further withdrawals from the territories and favour a humane, sensitive approach to economic policy, says an Israeli political scientist.

In an analysis of the results of the March 28 election, Haifa University professor Gabriel Ben-Dor said that most Israelis want to disengage from the Palestinians while maintaining Israel's security and preserving Israel's social welfare safety net.

Delivering the annual Harry Posen lecture at Holy Blossom Temple, Ben-Dor said the parameters of the election campaign were set by the centrist Kadima party and the left-of-centre Labor party, which, along with other parties, formed a coalition government earlier this month after weeks of wrangling.

For Kadima's Ehud Olmert, the election was essentially a plebiscite on Israel's unilateral pullout from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank last summer and the prospect of more withdrawals from Judea and Samaria.

For Labor leader Amir Peretz, the election was about Israel's social agenda after severe budget cuts by the previous finance minister and the need to throw a lifeline to 30 per cent of Israelis who live below the poverty line.

The election also showed that increasing numbers of Israelis are pragmatic and inward-looking and are alienated from unwavering ideological political causes, such as the preservation and expansion of existing West Bank settlements, Ben-Dor noted.

He said that Peretz, a former trade unionist, faces the task of rebuilding his credibility with his constituents, because he accepted the post of defence minister after making promises to close the widening social gap in Israeli society.

Ben-Dor said that while Olmert, the new prime minister, is "a man of few principles," he is nonetheless a suave politician who knows how to play the political game.

"He just wants to do a good job. What's wrong with that?"

Garbriel Ben-Dor

Ben-Dor said that Kadima, with 29 Knesset seats, fell short of replicating the still unsurpassed feat of the old Mapai party, which won 47 seats in the 1959 election and was thus able to dominate Israeli politics.

The Likud, under the leadership of Benjamin Netanyahu, "crashed badly," while the centrist Shinui party disappeared altogether, he noted.

Meanwhile, the Labor party managed to maintain its seat count, while the leftist Meretz party had its thunder stolen by Kadima on foreign policy issues and by the Labor and Pensioners parties on social matters.

According to Ben-Dor, the election confirmed ultra-nationalist politician Avigdor Lieberman, leader of the Yisrael Beiteinu party, as a pivotal figure, even though he was not invited into Olmert's cabinet.

Ben-Dor cited the emergence of the single-issue Pensioners party as the most important development of the election, but he did not elaborate.

Shas, the party that represents the right-wing Sephardi working class, is likely to remain the third largest force in the Knesset for the foreseeable future, he said, adding that the Arab parties, which espouse radical positions, continue to be marginal and are in no position to "dictate" to the Jewish majority.

Chabad Richmond Hill to get its own building

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Chabad Lubavitch of Richmond Hill will break ground for a new building on June 4.

It's evident that larger quarters are needed as director Rabbi Mendel Bernstein gives a visitor a tour of the current 3,000-square-foot storefront at Bathurst Street and Elgin Mills Road on a recent weekday morning.

As preschool children are happily occupied with arts and crafts projects, Rabbi Bernstein opens a door into a modest-sized adjacent storage room. "On Shabbos, all the preschool stuff goes in here, and we take out the tables and chairs [for services]," he said.

On average, the Saturday morning service draws between 70 and 90 people, he added. "There is a real mix – Canadians, Russians, and a few Israelis." Services are also held Monday, Thursday and Sunday mornings.

The rabbi and his wife, Toby, moved to Richmond Hill in 1997, and got the local Chabad off the ground in their home, using it as synagogue and preschool.

The 40-year-old father of nine – a native of London, England, who left there at age 15 to study in Israel, New York and South Africa – said he realized Richmond Hill was "underserved" when he ran a Chabad day camp in Thornhill and saw an increasing number of children from the area.

Currently, the closest synagogue in the area is Beit Rayim, a Conservative egalitarian congregation at Bayview and Weldrick avenues, about seven kilometres away, he said. It's expected to move to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's 50-acre Lebovic campus, about 3 kilometres south on Bathurst Street, in 2008.

Before Chabad moved to its current Richmond Hill quarters, the organization rented space at Yonge Street and Elgin Mills, but it "wasn't practical," according to Rabbi Bernstein, because most of the Jews in Richmond Hill live closer to Bathurst Street.

Chabad's preschool has grown from 10 children the first year to a total of 100. The organization also runs a Sunday Hebrew school from senior kindergarten to Grade 7 at Silver Pines Public School, with just over 200 students.

The new Chabad Romano Centre will be located diagonally opposite the current location, on the west side of Bathurst, just south of Teston Road (the continuation of Elgin Mills).

The building, which Rabbi Bernstein expects will be open in late 2007, will have 25,000 square feet of space to house a school, a mikvah, and a sanctuary and auditorium that – combined – will accommodate more than 600 people. It will be located on a 2.5-acre site donated by land developer Mario Romano of Castlepoint Development.

Romano told The CJN that, when he was growing up in Buenos Aires, most of his neighbourhood friends were Jewish. Today, he added, his friends and the people he works with are also predominantly Jewish.

As well, he said, the Bathurst Street area around the planned centre is "basically... a Jewish community. I wanted to have respect for that."

Chabad's growth in the area is evidenced, among other things, by the recent hiring of Rabbi Shlomo Vorovitch as youth director.

The native of Siberia, who spent the past dozen years working at the Jewish Russian Community Centre, will be responsible for the Hebrew school and youth programs, including children's Shabbat programs and a monthly "Youth Zone" program for children from ages six to 11.

Although he's 38 years old and a father of five, Rabbi Vorovitch, a hockey buff who studied education in Moscow, says he's "still a child inside."

He is, however, planning to institute programs for parents next year as well.

"It's important that parents know what their kids are learning," said Rabbi Bernstein.

UNIVERSITY OF HAIFA RENEWS ITS PRESENCE IN CANADA

Toronto lawyer, and partner in the law firm Goodman and Carr LLP, Peter L. Biro, was elected National President of Canadian Friends of Haifa University at a recent board meeting held in Toronto

Biro has been active in a number of Jewish and other community and political organizations and has been an outspoken human rights and civil liberties advocate. The boards on which he has served include West Toronto Support Services for Senior Citizens and the Disabled. He has published extensively on legal and political affairs and has chaired, presented and taught at various conferences and academic institutions

Canadian Friends of Haifa University was founded by Ray Wolfe ז"ל in 1973. Commented Prof. Ada Spitzer, Vice-President of the University of Haifa, "We are confident that with Peter's enthusiasm and passion for our cause, and Hetty's professional experience, together with our wonderful group of dedicated Board members, that Canadian Friends will be re-energized and rejuvenated."

"The university is renowned for its academically-challenging programs and pluralistic community of students and faculty," said Spitzer. "With a student body of 23,500, 16,500 are enrolled in under-graduate and graduate programs. We are very proud of our accomplishments, especially the contribution we have made toward peaceful coexistence," remarked Spitzer. "New immigrants, foreign students, Jews, Arabs and IDF officers live and work alongside each other in an atmosphere of tolerance, understanding and mutual respect."

The Hon. Gerry Weiner (Montréal) and Ron Yekutiel (Toronto) were elected as Vice-Presidents and Michael W. Davis was named Chairman of the Board. Ari Kashton was appointed Secretary-Treasurer and Guy Berman was appointed Honorary Counsel. Directors are: Prof. Howard Aster; Oliver Bush; Glenmorris Cohen; Sam Crystal; Dr. Michael Dan; Elham Farah; Deputy Mayor of Toronto, Mike Feldman; Howard Gerson; Juan Gutierrez; Steffi Halton; Ross Hendin; Marvin Sadowski; Prof. Stephen Scheinberg; Stephanie Shaffer; Dory Tuvim; Dr. Edward Wein, and Vivienne Ziner. Hetty Shapiro is the National Executive Director.

Trickster, hater, demagogue as hero

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was in Indonesia last week to meet with counterparts for discussions on the state of the Muslim world. While there, he went on a publicity offensive, exploiting every opportunity to meet with media to impart his point of view on the key issue preoccupying most of the western world – his country's nuclear program.

"Iran is ready to engage in dialogue with anybody. There is no limit to our dialogue," Ahmadinejad told Indonesia's Metro TV. The Iranian president may indeed be willing to "engage in dialogue" on the subject of his country's nuclear ambitions. But to no end that would be acceptable to the West: for he has repeatedly rejected any restrictions on Iran's right to weapons-grade enrichment of uranium and fumed at the possibility of Security Council curtailment, control or monitoring of his country's true enrichment program. Thus his purported openness for discussion is nothing more than a ruse, a trick to enable him to provide his adoring followers press-clipping proof of moderation and reasonableness in his herculean confrontation with the disbelievers of the West.

The prevaricating president's cause was boosted by the failure of the permanent members of the Security Council to press forward at the United Nations with the world's case against Iran. Russia and China did not allow the United States, Britain and France (and Germany, too, though not a permanent member of the council) to present a tough-minded resolution compelling Iran to suspend its uranium enrichment program. Further discussions have been postponed for a "few" weeks.

The simultaneous intervention of Mohammed el-Baradei, the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, also boosted Ahmadinejad's cause. "The only solution to the Iran situation is a comprehensive package through dialogue, through negotiation. The more we can go back to the negotiating table, the more we can address grievances from both sides," el-Baradei said.

Nothing could more usefully serve Ahmadinejad's phony arguments than el-Baradei's obsequious, if well-intended, pleading. The issue is not, nor has it ever been, Iran's right to nuclear energy for peaceful purposes. This has been made clear to the Iranian government many times. The real and true issue, as is apparent to all who have followed Iran's duplicity through the many stages of its quarrel with the IAEA, is Iran's desire to develop nuclear weapons. The cumulative effect of el-Baradei's remarks and of the Russian and Chinese obstruction is to simply give Iran more time to continue unimpeded with its dangerous program. Ahmadinejad did exclude one country from his general willingness "to dialogue with anybody." To a group of approving students, Ahmadinejad said, "Israel is doomed to crumble." He would not speak with the Jewish state, he told the impressionable youth. Hanging on his every word, they received the smiling demagogue as their hero.

We urge Canada to impress upon the governments of Russia and China the urgency of the situation. When a trickster, hater and demagogue is treated as a hero, we must all worry. We are all under threat.

25 years ago in The CJN

Philip Habib, U.S. President Ronald Reagan's special envoy to the Middle East, was working around the clock to diffuse a missile crisis between Israel and Syria. The crisis stemmed from Syria installing SAM surface-to-air missiles in eastern Lebanon. Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin agreed to give Habib the time he needed to resolve the issue.

Israeli policy saves Jewish lives

Michael Mandel is on the wrong side of morality ("Israeli policy puts Jewish lives at risk," letter, CJN, April 21). The Palestinians chose Hamas, a terrorist organization that despises the West and whose sole purpose is to destroy Israel and the Jews, to act on their behalf. There is no peace with Hamas. Mandel is missing the bigger picture. Islamist countries are waging war against Israel, world Jewry and the West, via the Palestinians. Is he blaming terrorist suicide bombings worldwide on Israel's legitimate acts to defend its citizens? Islamists believe that Israel was given to them by Allah and that Islam should govern all world religions. If he is concerned about his "stake in Israel" and his "responsibilities to it," he should turn his immediate attention and concern to the Iranian president's belief that Israel must be "wiped off the map." He wants all the Jews killed. A nuclear bomb will also kill the Palestinians.

Yom Hashoah memorial program

The recent hoopla over the Yom Hashoah memorial program ("Group of rabbis withdraw from Yom Hashoah event," CJN, April 21; "Why we chose not to attend," CJN, April 27; "Yom Hashoah memorial program," CJN, letters, May 4) shows how a self-righteous platform can bring about completely perverted judgment. Even a Reform rabbi knows the Orthodox viewpoint that a Jew is prohibited from listening to women sing. Conversely, even Reform rabbis are not prohibited from hearing males-only sing. To publicly boycott a Holocaust memorial ceremony because one's choice of a program is not provided is no less an affront to the entire Jewish nation than Holocaust denial.

Walk expresses our bond with Israel

On May 28, thousands of community members will be crowding downtown Toronto streets to walk with Israel and celebrate Israel's accomplishments.

Although, as Deborah Maes points out in her letter to the editor ("Jewish events promote materialism," CJN, April 27), participants can qualify for prizes, the primary purposes of the Walk With Israel are to express the unbreakable bond that connects us with our Jewish state and to raise funds for children at risk around the world. All of our Walk With Israel literature strongly stresses the critical importance of proudly demonstrating our ties to Israel, especially when the world is confronted by evil calls for her annihilation. That is why more than 15,000 people traditionally turn out for the world's largest Israel solidarity walk outside of Israel. It's the most powerful possible response!

We urge every single Jewish community member to join us for Jewish Toronto's most popular annual event.

We must 'push community leadership'

The letter "Jewish events promote materialism" (CJN, April 27) and Rabbi Flanzraich's guest voice explaining why the Toronto Board of Rabbis withdrew its endorsement of the Holocaust memorial program at Earl Bales Park ("Why we chose not to take part," CJN, April 27) are two examples of individuals who have taken personal responsibility and spoken about issues that mattered deeply to them.

We as a people cannot sit by idly about issues that affect our Jewish community. Each of us has a role to play and can contribute to keeping alive the Judaic values that have kept our people vibrant for so many centuries. Each of us must find and express our voices to push community leadership to keep focused on what is important for community unity and Jewish continuity.

Ahmadinejad in Germany

It has been widely publicized that Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad will be visiting Germany and will be seated in the VIP section while Iran's national soccer team plays. Ironically, the game will be in Nuremberg stadium, just a stone's throw from the very first Nazi marches.

Germany has shown great leadership in enacting laws to prosecute Holocaust deniers and has been generally supportive of all measures denouncing racism and anti-Semitism. Since Ahmadinejad's Holocaust denial remarks and his call for the destruction of Israel were made in Iran, in all probability, he cannot be prosecuted in Germany unless he were to repeat his hateful rhetoric while there. Nonetheless, he can only come to Germany on the invitation of the German government. I would ask that all your readers write to the German ambassador to Canada, urging him that Ahmadinejad not be permitted to travel to Germany as a persona non grata.

'They will be our witnesses'

By ELI RUBENSTEIN

"We have all just spent a very challenging week in Poland. We have seen the worst level of behaviour that humanity can express, which resulted in the near destruction of Jewish life in eastern Europe. But this evening, when I look out at this sea of young faces, here in our homeland, the land of Israel, and see your commitment and dedication to Am Yisrael, I know that the future of the Jewish People is in good hands."

These words were spoken by Anita Ekstein, Holocaust survivor, hidden child and national chair of the March of the Living, to Canadian march participants, at a special ceremony in Israel held on the eve of Yom Ha'atzmaut.

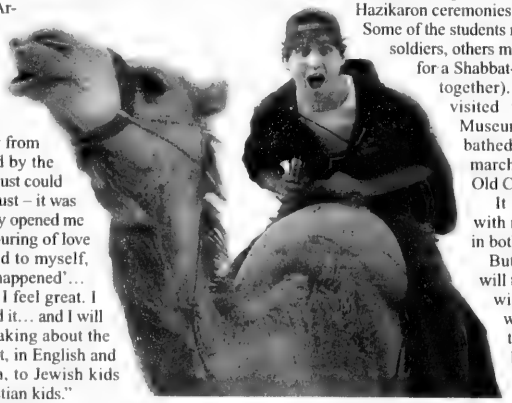
"I am certain that I speak for all of my fellow survivors," she continued, "when I say, that travelling with 500 Canadian Jewish teens to Poland, and being here together with you in Israel – there is simply no better feeling in the world. Your presence with us on the March of the Living fills us, the survivors, with the greatest sense of hope possible and helps us truly believe that Am Yisrael Chai!"

The March of the Living was founded in 1988 by two Israeli visionaries, Abraham Hirchson (the current Israeli finance minister) and Dr. Shmuel Rosenman. The initial goals of the program included combating Holocaust denial; educating Jewish youth about the history of the Shoah and the acts of courage and sacrifice that occurred during the Shoah; strengthening the bonds of Jewish youth with Israel, thereby enhancing their sense of Jewish identity; fighting anti-Semitism and all forms of racism; and acquainting the young participants with the richness of Jewish life that once existed in eastern Europe.

But during the 18-year history of the March of the Living, one aspect has become a central element of the program: the transmission of memory from survivor to student, from one generation to the next.

On the 2006 March of the Living, each Canadian delegation was accompanied by one or more Holocaust survivors who shared their experiences with the students.

Bill Glied, a survivor from Toronto, explained his reason for participating. "I am very concerned about the continuation of the history of the Holocaust… I don't want the Shoah to disappear into history like the Armenian genocide. I think I succeeded in helping the students understand their responsibility to make sure that what happened should never happen again."



Ben Younger, a survivor from Montreal, felt transformed by the trip. "For most of my life, I just could not speak about the Holocaust – it was too hurtful. But the kids, they opened me up… When I saw the outpouring of love and affection for me, I said to myself, 'I've got to tell them what happened'…

"Now I feel great. I finally did it… and I will keep speaking about the Holocaust, in English and in French, to Jewish kids and Christian kids."

For David Shentow of Ottawa, a Holocaust survivor (and a former Auschwitz inmate), the experience was "inspiring."

"The young people said to me, 'David you opened our eyes,' because I explained to them what it was like to be a survivor. The students couldn't do enough for me on the trip. For many of them, I was like the zayde they never had… The students told me, 'David, this time you will walk into Auschwitz and then you will walk out with us' and they never left my side…

"To me, the March of the Living is not just a journey – it's a sacred pilgrimage."

At the suggestion of Montreal Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz, the participants from that city each placed a stone in front of the crematoria in Birkenau as a memorial to the six million. When they were finished, they turned around and realized that they had created a large mound, a temporary yet eloquent memorial to those who perished there. Later, when the Toronto delegation visited Birkenau, many participants took dust from the land of Israel and spread it out over the ruins of the crematoria, reflecting the Jewish custom of burying loved ones with the earth of the holy land.

In Israel, at the Kotel (the Western Wall), many students put on tfillin or kissed the stones of the Wall for the first time. The Canadian delegations all participated in Yom Hazikaron ceremonies to honour Israel's fallen. Some of the students met with wounded Israeli soldiers, others met with their Israeli peers for a Shabbat-long mifgash (gathering together). The Canadian groups visited the new Yad Vashem Museum, climbed Masada, bathed in the Dead Sea and marched through Jerusalem's Old City on Yom Ha'atzmaut.

It was a journey packed with meaningful experiences in both Poland and Israel.

But, as March participants will tell you, their interaction with the survivors is what will be cherished among their most precious and hallowed memories from the trip.

Listening to the survivors' stories of their childhoods in towns such as Warsaw, Krakow and Lublin; dancing with a survivor in the courtyard of the Yeshiva Chachmei Lublin or in Jerusalem; or holding the hand of a survivor while he or she walked through Treblinka, Majdanek, Auschwitz-Birkenau or Belzec – these experiences are a life-lasting legacy from the survivors to each March participant.

Although we hope that every survivor will live the lifespan of our ancestor Moses (120 years), reality tells us that Holocaust survivors will not be with us forever, and their ability to take the arduous two-week journey to Poland and Israel diminishes with each year.

We must try to encourage as many of our young people as possible to participate in this remarkable journey while the survivors can still accompany them.

"I go back because of the kids," said Anita Ekstein, who has participated in six marches, "so I can share my story with them while I still can.

"They should learn what happened to our ancestors, because once we are gone, they will be our witnesses."

Analyzing suicide terrorism

Suicide bombings perpetrated by Palestinian terrorists against Israeli civilians have to a great extent defined the pace and tone of Israeli-Palestinian relationships since they first began in 1993. And since they reached their peak during the early years of the second intifadah, there has been a measurable decrease in the number of successful attacks. Nonetheless, as recently as earlier this month, Hamas' political leader, Khaled Meshal, when addressing a group of students in Damascus, once again declared that suicide bombing is a "natural right" of the Palestinians in their ongoing struggle "to defend themselves."

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

What Meshal's pronouncement underscores is that, despite the retribution and suffering that suicide terrorism has wrought on its own people, Hamas still embraces such extremism as an essential strategy in its ongoing war against Israel. But for many nations, particularly those who have themselves felt the sting of terrorism, this barbaric practice has become an anathema.

Gone are the days when the conduct of the bomber could be defended on the basis that "these are desperate acts" by people "driven to desperation," as was once espoused by perennial Palestinian spokesperson Hanan Ashrawi, for example. And while desperation, stemming from a variety of sources, is a probable factor that motivates prospective shahids, it is by no means the only variable that steers them in their perverse quest for self-destruction.

This should not be overlooked because, if it is, there follows the trap of acknowledging the bombers as victims, thereby rationalizing their motives and ignoring the misguided framework in which they operate. Rather, the ideology that underpins suicide terrorism should be viewed as a unique example of political exploitation combined with a delusional pattern of behaviour that finds sustenance in the group that nurtures it.

As stated by psychologist Irwin Mansdorf (Jerusalem Letter/Viewpoints, April 15, 2003), "It's actually group dynamics that reinforce behaviour within a Palestinian-Arab culture where suicide bombers are viewed as heroes whose faces are prominently displayed on public posters and where families of bombers are showered with both respect and financial reward."

So, when someone like Meshal continues to proclaim the legitimacy of suicide bombing, the world should again be taking note and reacting accordingly. Moreover, as suggested by columnist Bradley Burston last month in Ha'aretz (April 21), it's about time that Hamas and their ilk to begin to recognize that "the shahid bomber, [in] soiling the name of Islam as he acts in the name of Allah, has soiled the name of Palestine as no one else, draining the Palestinian people of the abundant reservoir of international goodwill that their cause and their plight enjoyed for decades."

He adds: "There are few acts [that] are more obscenely pornographic than human bombs who target the innocent and the uninvolved."

Jerusalem, real and imagined

Jerusalem Day, May 25, commemorating the conquest (or, as many would prefer, the "liberation") of Jordanian east Jerusalem and the city's subsequent unification as the united capital of Israel, lies just around the bend. In 1998, the day of celebration was upgraded to the status of a national holiday, sending a clear message to the so-called peaceniks (who were seen as being overly compromising regarding the city) and, of course, to the Palestinians.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

The annual festivities will be marked this year, as always, by people advancing in droves upon the Israeli capital from around the land and beyond its borders. Long processions of soldiers, schoolchildren, scouts, pensioners, politicians, military units, right-wing political action groups, tourists and Christian friends will strut proudly and defiantly up the mountain and down through the city streets in an impressive demonstration of support for the principle of Jerusalem as the eternal, undivided capital of the Jewish people and state.

The Kotel plaza will be spruced up and jam-packed. In a host of ceremonies and rallies, politicians, mayors, diplomats, religious leaders and government officials will muster all of their rhetorical skills to give fit and moving expression to the enormous significance of the historical return of the Jewish people to the spiritual and political heart of the nation. Meanwhile, in far-off lands at dozens of parallel events in synagogues, churches, embassies and halls of power, distinguished persons, some holding high office, will express their unqualified solidarity with the idea of a united Jerusalem under the Israeli flag.

And then, at day's end, as the sun slowly sets on the fizzling celebrations and the torrent of high-minded declarations dwindles and fades, I will take my customary stroll down the badly littered, depressingly half-vacant streets lined with banners and streamers, streets from which the legions of merrymakers will have already departed. That awesome tide of cars and buses which, like an enormous sea swell, had earlier in the day inundated the city, will by then, with an equal but opposite determination, be withdrawing from it just as fast as their little combustion engines will carry them down the steep and winding mountain highway toward the Elysian fields of the coastal plain,where life, as most Israelis see it and actually want to live it, is to be found.

And I will observe all this and reach the same cynical conclusion – namely, that there is Jerusalem, and there is Jerusalem. The first is the city in which some of us live, and the second is more of an ideal than a locale, with a name inscribed in the heavens in bold capital letters, and capable of arousing powerful emotional responses and eliciting statements of firm commitment – but only in an abstract, non-committal sort of way.

For poor old Jerusalem remains the kind of place people fight to the death over, but wouldn't, as a rule, be caught dead living in. And all the Jerusalem Days and Jerusalem Day laws, ceremonies and rallies – with their proud and patriotic speeches about never giving up a square inch of our Eternal Capital because of a thousand quotes and references to it in religious texts, prayers and historical documents – will not, and cannot change one simple truth: that although Judaism and Jerusalem are perhaps inseparable, Jews and Jerusalem, as the dry data show, are certainly not.

"If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand lose its cunning…" and so on. Perhaps. But that does not curb the steady, uninterrupted outward migration of ordinary Jews from Jerusalem to just about everywhere and anywhere else, while the relative proportions of Palestinians and haredim among the city's population grow. And soon enough, all things being equal, we will lose our national capital, not with a bang, but with a whimper.

And if you stick around long enough, to the very end of Jerusalem Day – to when the gleeful Zionist celebrants have all vanished – you, too, will see the municipal work crews of Arabs head into the silent and empty parks to clean up after us, and the haredim come out of their places of hiding from us. And the Holy City will once again be what it always was, and still is.

Living well is the best revenge

For Jews, and particularly for Israelis, a visit to Russia today is an exhilarating experience and an important reminder that Jewish history is not only about tragedy and disaster.

Walking the streets of Moscow is like visiting another planet. It's difficult to recall that for decades, this was the centre of the Communist empire that Lenin and Stalin created, and that waged war on the Jewish people and Israel. At the time, it seemed like this evil empire was invincible.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

For many years, beginning with Stalin's reign of terror, anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism went hand in hand. Synagogues were closed, Jewish activists were arrested and leaders were killed after show trials, while the rest were forbidden from leaving the Soviet "workers' paradise." The armies of Egypt and Syria were armed and trained by the Soviet Union, and on some occasions, Soviet troops, including pilots, were directly involved in attacks against Israel. Moscow also supported PLO terrorists and helped build PLO leader Yasser Arafat's infrastructure during this period.

But suddenly, 15 years ago, Russians, including Jews, were freed from the house of bondage. Synagogues have since been reopened and rebuilt, including the kosher café in Moscow's Marina Roscha Jewish community centre. And old-style Jewish politics have been revived, as rabbis from inside and outside Russia battle for influence with President Vladimir Putin and the Kremlin, while denouncing their rivals.

Many of the new oligarchs – who are very wealthy and powerful – are Jewish, and their lifestyles can be summarized by the phrase "living well is the best revenge." The confidence of successful post-Communist Jews can be compared to the Israelites who left Egypt after the 10 plagues "with their fists clenched" as a symbol of victory over a bitter oppressor and carrying the goods they had earned after generations of slavery.

At the same time, Jews are aware of the ambivalence that Russian society has about its Communist past – the break is not absolute and perhaps not irrevocable.

The images of Stalin have been removed, and while Stalingrad retains its historical importance as the site of the battle against the Nazis during World War II, the city is again known as Volgograd. Similarly, St. Petersburg is back on world maps and Leningrad has been erased.

However, Lenin - the founder of the Communist state – is still widely revered. His body (or perhaps a wax imitation) remains on display in a mausoleum in Red Square next to the Kremlin walls, and a large bust of Lenin is featured at the entrance to the subway stop at the Lenin Library.

And unlike eastern Europe, where the abuses of the secret police have been exposed, disowned and buried, in Russia, the process of revisiting the abuses of the past has barely begun. The KGB headquarters in the dreaded Lubyanka are now occupied by the Federal Security Service – and some of the KGB's feared practices have not changed. But with a massive toy store across the street, the terror evoked by the building's history seems less imposing.

The ambivalence toward the Communist past is also apparent in the behaviour of the former "Jews of Silence," for whom the terror of the Soviet era remains fresh and not entirely buried. For many, the sight of the old police and army paraphernalia, sold as Cold War souvenirs, remains spine-tingling and trivializes the evil of this period. And while Putin is not anti-Semitic (some even refer to him as philo-Semitic), there is a quiet fear that the wealth of the Jewish oligarchs will be exploited in a future wave of Russian anti-Semitism that might accompany the collapse of the fragile capitalist economy. As well, racist assaults in Russia are frequent, and in January, an attacker at the Chabad Bolshaya Bronnaya Synagogue in Moscow stabbed nine people before being subdued.

But the dominant mood in the synagogues and streets of Moscow today is one of optimism and joy at the liberation from bondage. The many teachers and community leaders sent from Israel and the Diaspora to restore Jewish life and learning are visible and busy, despite difficult conditions. To be in Russia today is to touch and be touched by the miracle of a modern Exodus.

The Kirshner File

Farmers tap potential and promise of Negev

Israel's largest underdeveloped region, the sparsely populated Negev Desert, which comprises two-thirds of its land mass, is surprisingly fertile.

To a Canadian visitor, the Negev looks hopelessly barren and arid, simply unfit for agriculture, but appearances can really be deceptive, as Nimrod Priel and Eyal Izrael can both attest.

Sheldon Kirshner in Israel

Priel, 34, manages a vast olive plantation in Revivim, a kibbutz 35 kilometres south of Be'er Sheva where Golda Meir, a former Israeli prime minister, lived at one point in her life.

Izrael, 47, runs a thriving vineyard and winery in the wastes between Sde Boker, David Ben-Gurion's kibbutz, and Avdat, an ancient Nabatean trade centre and caravan stopover.

Innovative and hardworking, they prove the adage that the forbidding Negev is indeed a place of possibilities and promise, as Ben-Gurion tirelessly proclaimed.

"The Negev has huge potential," said Michal Amichai, a young agronomist at the Ramat Negev Desert Agro-Research Centre, more than 30 kilometres south of Be'er Sheva.

Here, close to a military site where Israeli soldiers learn to operate Patriot missile batteries, researchers grow a panoply of vegetables and fruits in greenhouses from tomatoes and peppers to olives and grapes, all irrigated by brackish, or salty, water from local wells.

Revivim, as well as Izrael's farm, is smack dab in the middle of the Negev highlands, where climactic and soil conditions favour agriculture on a commercial scale.

"It's a special part of the Negev," explained Amichai, who has the physique and bearing of an athlete. "The sandy soil interacts well with saline water, and the weather is good."

The Negev highlands are considerably cooler than the Arava, south of the Dead Sea, and the dry weather discourages fungal plant diseases.

Priel, whose father Victor was raised in Toronto, has been running Revivim's olive plantation since 1995. At 3,500 dunams (about 900 acres), it's the biggest such facility in Israel. "We're a green spot in a very brown environment."

Revivim, which was Israel's southernmost settlement until statehood, produced 3,500 tons of olives last year and will double its output within a few years. Although much of its crop is sold and consumed in Israel, some of it is exported to North America in the form of high-quality olive oil under the brand name of Halutza.

"We have roughly 150,000 trees and several varieties," said Priel. "Barnea, an Israeli type, has quite a strong taste and is flavourful. It makes up half of our yield. We also cultivate Suri, Spanish and Italian olives."

Itzik David, Amichai's colleague at the Ramat Negev Desert Agro-Research Centre, said that the Negev produced 20,000 tons of olives last year, compared with 50,000 tons in the Galilee."Olives can manage with different climates," he said, "but they thrive in the Negev due to the dry air and the low number of insects."

Being aware of the adaptability of olives, the Israelites decided to cultivate them. During that era, immense olive plantations flourished, especially in the western Galilee. Such was their importance that olives are cited in the Bible and rabbinic literature.

Eyal Izrael, a local winemaker

Revivim, founded in 1943 as an experimental agricultural station with the assistance of the Jewish National Fund and temporarily cut off by the Egyptian army during the 1948 War of Independence, did not take olives seriously until quite recently.

The earliest settlers cultivated plums, apricots, peaches and avocados. They relied on water from winter runoffs and stored it in a reservoir, knowing that rainfall in these parts measures only 100 millimetres per annum.

With the construction of the National Water Carrier in the 1960s, the farmers of Revivim no longer had to worry about poor rainfalls. But as the price of water skyrocketed, fruit cultivation became economically unfeasible."We had to change to survive," explained Priel. "We looked for a crop that did not require much water and could tolerate salty water."

Olives were the solution.

Thanks to the Jewish National Fund, which has reclaimed virtually all the arable land in the Negev, Revivim became a major olive producer.

Down the road a bit, in a remote gully 600 metres above sea level hemmed in by steep hills, Izrael reigns supreme as the area's premier winemaker.

"We grow beautiful grapes," he said, trying not to sound too immodest.

Agronomist Michal Amichai

On 24 dunams (about six acres) leased from and developed by the Jewish National Fund, he tends to a boutique vineyard that, he claimed, is unique. "It's planted on a Nabatean vineyard."

Last season, Izrael and his wife, Hana, harvested 30 tons of grapes and bottled 5,000 bottles of Cabernet Sauvignon and Merlot red wine, each and every bottle for the Israeli market. "We make a good wine," said Izrael, whose brands have won an Israeli gold medal.

A former resident of Haifa who was once an apple farmer on a moshav, Izrael has been here for the past 7½ years, having been encouraged to put down roots by the Jewish Agency, an Israeli institution whose mandate is to settle the land.

"It was like a dream," he said. "I was looking for a project to begin something from scratch. My wife and I both love the Negev. Here you can let your imagination work."

In addition to their vineyard, the Izraels run a six-room bed-and-breakfast inn where guests can sample their homemade jams and pickled olives.

The simple cottages, with atmospheric gravel floors and airy porches, catch pleasant morning and evening breezes. "There is no humidity at all in summer," he said. "People come from Tel Aviv and don't even need air conditioning."

Typically, guests converge on their bed and breakfast to experience solitude, try their wine and tour the farm.

When the Izraels announced their intention to settle in this corner of the Negev, along with about a dozen other families, they were greeted by skepticism.

"People said, 'You're crazy.'"

He, too, wondered whether he could make a success of it.

"We risked a lot of money," he said. "And there were question marks. Would the grapes grow? Could we sell the wine? We were in uncharted territory. It was, like, unknown."

As he readily admitted, the cultivation of wine grapes in the Negev is no small challenge.

"We have to be very accurate in our methods. Conditions are very tough. But you get beautiful results if you take care of things."

He works long hours, aided by his wife and two hired labourers.

"It's never-ending. There is always something to do. We just finished trimming the vines, and now we're preparing the irrigation system.We harvest the grapes in August and September, and wine production lasts from October to December."

Izrael, a rough-hewn man who could have been a poster boy for the kibbutz movement, was interviewed in the first week of March, when spring was in the air and wildflowers were on the cusp of blooming on the desert floor.

In his view, the Negev remains largely neglected due to a lack of national will and budgetary shortfalls.

"The government should channel more funds to the Negev. I hope it will be done."

Meanwhile, he is content with his lot as a pioneer in Israel's last frontier. "It's still very new and very raw. There is work to be done here."

Bais Yaakov pays tribute to Rabbi Stefansky

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Hakarat hatov – gratitude – was the message expressed by those who came out on May 7 to pay tribute to Rabbi Akiva Stefansky for his 40 years of leadership at Toronto's Bais Yaakov High School for girls.

In his acknowledgment of the message at the dinner in his honour held at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto, Rabbi Stefansky said all he needed to do now was to "figure out what that gratitude is for. [Bais Yaakov] is the effort of many people working l'shem shomayim [for the sake of heaven]," he said, adding that his role has been "to serve as a pipeline" for the wisdom of his rebbes and his mother "in the time even before I could understand."

Rabbi Stefansky spoke of the role of Jewish women, as exemplified by the biblical Hannah, from whom Jewish tradition draws the model of how to pray. In her request for a child – "one little soldier" she could give back to God's army – she expressed an attitude and ambition Rabbi Stefansky said typifies Jewish femininity. "This is the model of a Jewish mother."

Hannah's humility, requesting a gift from God purely so that she could return him to God, rewarded her with a son, the prophet Shmuel, he said. "She asked for one little boy to sing in the choir [but was given] a son as great as Moshe and Aharon together."

Born in Vienna in 1925, Rabbi Stefansky originally moved to Israel with his family, but came to New York in 1953 to pursue a career in business. There, he met Rabbi Aharon Kotler, who was a highly respected rosh yeshiva in Lakewood, N.J. Rabbi Kotler told him he was on the wrong path: "You have to go into chinuch [education]." After a brief period teaching in Boston, Rabbi Stefansky came to Bais Yaakov in Toronto in 1965.

In a video tribute shown at the recent event, Toronto's Rabbi Moshe Mordechai Lowy said of Rabbi Stefansky: "He should write a book on chinuch... He himself is a book on chinuch."

Many of Bais Yaakov's over 1,800 alumnae spoke of the influence Rabbi Stefansky and Bais Yaakov had on their lives. Graduate and teacher Sara Bell said that, at first, she thought the rabbi's insular approach was "out of touch" with the real world. Gradually, she said, she realized that "it was I who was out of touch."

The most rewarding part of teaching and guiding students, Rabbi Stefansky said, has been when a student initially resists Torah concepts and gradually, is not only persuaded to accept them, but "comes to firmly defend them as her own."

His message to students and alumnae is that he wants to instil in Jewish girls a deeper love and awareness of their roots and role, a role which differs greatly from that which secular society would have them play. "We have nothing to learn from modern innovators," he said.

"I've been proud to be a conduit of this message in many guises," reaching every student according to her needs, he added.

Standing strong against society's pressure is nothing new for Rabbi Stefansky. Reflecting on the climate in the community when Rabbi Stefansky first arrived in the 1960s, Toronto's Rabbi Mordechai Ochs recalled in the video the struggle to "persuade parents to 'ghettoize' their children" by enrolling them in a Jewish day school.

Today, that struggle continues against influences like the Internet and even university, which many consider a detrimental environment for any Jewish child, boy or girl. In response, Rabbi Stefansky helped create Talpiot College, which offers post-secondary education within the framework of the Bais Yaakov environment and grants degrees recognized by the government of Ontario.

In his keynote address, Rabbi Meyer Schwab of Bais Yaakov in Denver, Colo., spoke of these concerns and praised the tens of thousands of Jewish families Bais Yaakov Toronto has created. "Tzaddikim are not easy to come by," he said, but Rabbi Stefansky is one of "a few planted in each generation."

Get the gift of the yovel – today

RABBI MORDECAI ZEITZ

Rabbinic Reflections

I remember times as a child when I pleaded to my friends or even my parents, "Let me do it again!" The third strike in a baseball game or a missed basket in the dying moments of a crucial game, the test I forgot to study for or the investment that might have changed my life – all elicited from me, with full sincerity, the plaintive plea, "That one doesn't count! Let's do it again!"

As adults, we often have the same wish. If only I could do it over again, I know the results would be so much better. I'm sure each of us has had the urge to "do it over again."

Suppose you could start everything all over again. If you could wipe out the past and start fresh, could or would things be different? It's a dream and a luxury we contemplate, but it's a reality that we know in our gut we will never enjoy.

Yet, such a reality is described in this week's Torah reading in the concept of yovel, the jubilee year. Everything in Jewish society was based on a 50-year cycle. Nothing was forever. The sale of property and houses, as well as loans, debts and even slavery (where and when it existed) were all valid for a 50-year period. Everything was negotiated in accordance with how many years remained in the yovel cycle. In the 50th year, everything returned to the way it was at the beginning of the cycle. Property was returned to its original owner, private debts were cancelled – everything was rewound back to zero, to the original starting point. You literally got to start life all over again.

I can appreciate a second chance being given to members of a new generation who would not be burdened by a past for which they had no responsibility. It's an ideal the Torah sets out as to how things ought to be, but facts in the real world tell us that the same person with the same mindset, confronted with the same situation, would repeat their original action. In other words, for the most part, if we do not learn from our previous mistakes, we tend to repeat the same mistakes, using the same poor judgment that got us into trouble in the first place.

Whether it's in dealing with the recurring challenges of history, or in business decisions, marriages, personal relationships and the rehabilitation of many forms of addiction, we have a tendency to repeat our previous actions. So there appears to be no sense in winding back the clock, because we would merely end up in the same situation. It would only be yesterday, repeated again today.

And so while the dream of "If I could just do it again" appears to be a pipe dream, we should not despair. There is a unique interpretation of the yovel experience that can make a difference. Adopting the true yovel spirit today can actually spell the difference tomorrow.

We declare daily: "Hamchadaish betuvo b'chol yom tamid" – God affords us the opportunity to change direction through our actions every day. The more realistic plan is to modify what happened yesterday by starting fresh the next day with a fresh outlook. Every day is a new day and not a repeat of the past. Yovel is not so much about wiping out the past as it is about providing for the beginning of a new chapter. Planning for, and truly believing in, a better today without being overwhelmed by yesterday will set the stage for a more successful tomorrow. Yovel tells us that we are not shackled by the missteps of the past. We can have a fresh start every day.

What power! What privilege! What opportunity! But the potential of starting fresh every day and realizing the vast potential of each new day as a great gift given to us by the Almighty is not a dream, and it need not wait for 50 years. The gift of yovel can be applied to the here and now by starting every day as if it was the first day of your renewed life. So meet the challenge of daily life by improving today for an even better tomorrow.

Whither Conservative Judaism?

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Midrashic Moments

All denominations are riddled with cliches foisted on them by others, as is the case with the classic perception of Conservative Judaism.

Summaries of the movement quickly revert to the thesis that it stakes out a "middle ground" between Reform and Orthodoxy, and that it both believes in the binding nature of halachah and the evolution of the same. By definition, an intermediate position means enduring the pull from both ends, and that seems to be a hard place to survive in. And as is well known, the 2000 National Jewish Population Survey found that Conservative Judaism is losing ground, and perhaps even losing its way. Synagogue affiliation is dipping and the movement seems to lack a sense of united purpose and passionate vision.

In his keynote address to the United Synagogue convention, Rabbi Neil Gilman of the Jewish Theological Seminary, the movement's flagship rabbinical college, argued that Conservative belief has always been associated with relativity and uncertainty. And Rabbi David Wolpe wrote that Conservative Judaism is "crying out for renewal and revitalization," and that in synagogues that define themselves as Conservative, "the congregants often expect halachic observance from their rabbis, yet they are not moved to emulate them. Conservative Jews are increasingly confused and uncertain about their spiritual direction."

I do not cite these speeches with a feeling of triumphalism. The confusion of any Jew is hardly something to be cherished, unless it's the prelude to clarity and a search for truth. But there is a ring of accuracy to the statements made by these two scholars, one that has profound implications for Jewish education, both on a philosophical and a practical level.

Can there be an "in-between space" in Judaism, where halachah is seriously attended to but not ultimately seen as the last word in one's life? For students, whether they be of preschool or university age, the ideology of the middle ground can be both comfortable and, paradoxically, unsettling. Talking about the need for halachah without really owning it in a genuine way – the 1990 NJPS survey indicated that a vast majority of Conservative Jews do not buy only kosher meat or keep Shabbat – can create a feeling of connection to Jewish tradition, but also a lack of coherence in one's religious outlook.

Of course, coherence is not always attainable or even desirable, in a complex world. But if, after genuine struggle, halachic consistency cannot be achieved, it should at least be an a priori goal. I have never understood how personal comfort can be a religious benchmark in any meaningful sense. Isn't the purpose of Torah to challenge people to transcend their present level of spiritual commitment and direction? Is Judaism there to "fit" our already-determined path, or is it meant to draw us into a different, fuller and, yes, sometimes more difficult, set of negotiations with reality?

Ironically, argues Rabbi Jerome Epstein, it may be that some of the gravitation of Conservative Jews toward Reform congregations is precisely because of the former's maintenance of certain standards – for instance, what Epstein calls "a more demanding religious education" or the relatively limited participation in Conservative ritual that is allowed for intermarried families.

Caught between the desire for tradition and the embrace of modernity, young people, as always, will play out the endgame of the Conservative future.

Examining religion scientifically

Breaking the Spell: Religion As A Natural Phenomenon* by Daniel C. Dennett, Viking.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The author of this complex and controversial book is a university professor of philosophy and a convinced Darwinian. He asserts that religion plays such a primary role in modern society that it should be examined in a scientific manner.

He asks questions such as these: Why does religion exist? Is it the product of blind evolutionary instinct or rational choice? Do the traditional reasons offered for God's existence make sense? Are religious ideas beneficial? Do religious beliefs provide the best avenue to a life of truth, justice and altruism?

The very title of the volume makes it clear that the author views religion as a kind of pernicious spell that must be broken. He writes: "We should not set aside our traditional reluctance to investigate religious phenomena scientifically, so that we can come to understand how and why religions inspire such devotion, and figure out how we should deal with them all in the 21st century."

A confirmed atheist, the author finds the idea of God unreasonable and even the source of contention and evil. But what about the belief in God? Many people, he is convinced, don't believe in God, but feel that the concept is beneficial because it leads to ethical behaviour.

But is this the case? No, argues Dennett, there is no evidence whatsoever that religious believers are generally better-behaved than non-believers. "I have uncovered no evidence to support the claim that people, religious or not, who don't believe in reward in heaven and/or punishment in hell are more likely to kill, rape, rob or break their promises than people who do."

He points out that the prison population in the United States shows Catholics, Protestants, Jews, Muslims and others – including those with no religious affiliation – represented in about the same proportion as they are in the general population. Others with no religious affiliation exhibit the same range of moral excellence and turpitude as born-again Christians, but, more to the point, so do the members of religions that de-emphasize or actively deny any relationship between moral behaviour on earth and eventual reward and punishment after death.

The author asserts that "plenty of deeply spiritual people – and everybody knows this – are cruel, arrogant, self-centred, and utterly unconcerned about the moral problems of the world. Indeed, one of the truly nauseating side effects of the common confusion of moral goodness with 'spirituality' is that it permits untold numbers of people to slack off on the sacrifice and good works and hide behind sacred masks of piety and moral worth."

Not surprisingly, Dennett is dismayed – even fearful – of the influence of the religious right in the United States and their apocalyptic teachings that include the coming of Armageddon, which will separate the blessed from the sacred on the final Day of Judgment.

Their views are dangerous because they give allegiance to creed ahead of commitment to democracy, peace, (earthly) justice and truth. Moreover, they are willing to take political action to bring about those conditions they think are requisite for the coming of the end of the world

What Dennett seems to lack is any sense of reverence for the sacred. There is no consideration of the consolation of religion in overcoming grief and depression, the role of ritual that acts out and dramatizes the human condition, the warmth of tradition, the expressive and emotive feelings that flow from myth and narrative, or the wisdom and values they contain.

Breaking the Spell is provocative, mind-expanding and often convincing, but hardly the last word on a subject of infinite variety and immeasurable depth.

The readers recommend

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Once again, I turn the tables and let readers recommend their favourite Israeli and Jewish websites.

Michael Mirsky wants to put Israel into perspective – literally. Mirsky and his family have created a website to convey how large (or small) Israel really is. By overlaying maps of the same scale, this site lets you compare the size of Israel to famous metropolitan areas including London, Berlin and Washington D.C. For example, the distance between the Mediterranean (near Herzliya) and the West Bank is roughly the same as Manhattan and the Bronx. A bit closer to their home in Thornhill, Ont., Michael points out "that the narrowest point of the Green Line is the same distance as from Lake Ontario to Sheppard Avenue." [http://sizeofisrael.com/]

Everyone needs a bubbe. Gail Goldstein of Montreal wrote to tell me about a favourite site of hers, Bubbe's Back Porch. Back in 1998, women from around the world shared stories about their amazing grandmothers. Those stories have now found a permanent place at this site. You can find bubbe anecdotes about birth, leaving a homeland, romance, assimilation and, of course, food.

"Bubbe Ida had no recipes. Everything she cooked, baked or stewed was in her head. She never measured anything, either. My father would tease Bubbe. 'How much flour did you use in your teyglach?' he would ask. 'Oh, a glass full,' said Bubbe. 'What size glass?' asked Dad. Enough teasing yelled my mother. She knew you could not push Bubbe too far. I watched her cook. The glass size was always different, yet the end product was pure perfection." [www.bubbe.com/]

Yariv Abramovith wrote to tell me about the Israeli environmental organization, Zalul. Zalul (which means "clear" in Hebrew) was founded in 1999 and has successfully fought for the removal of fish farming in the Gulf of Eilat. The gulf's fragile coral reefs have been threatened by pollution caused by the waste runoff from commercial fish farms. But Zalul says the gulf still faces dangers posed by illegal fishing practices, an oil pipeline and tourism. You can read about their other projects at Zalul's bilingual site. [www.zalul.org.il/en/]

I received an e-mail about a new podcast titled Chareidio, a clever title combining the words "chareidim" and "radio." Without taking themselves too seriously, this podcast presents interviews about such topics as "Science and Torah," and a description of what life will be like after the arrival of the Messiah. I found the humour a bit forced but was interested to hear how this segment of Jewish society is making use of new technologies. [www.chareidio.com/]

I regularly get notes from Lawrence Grossman in Benicia, Calif., one of the unsung heroes of the Jewish Internet. Grossman is the creator of the Jewish Webcasting Guide, the best list of Jewish and Israeli radio and television offerings on the web. You'll find everything: links to Israeli radio and TV, audio Jewish classes and programs about Yiddish, Jewish history and music. [www.jewishwebcasting.com/] Never one to let a challenge pass him by, Grossman has added a new section to his site where he lists more than 40 podcasts. [www.jewishwebcasting.com/podcasts.htm]

We currently are in the seven-week period between Passover and Shavuot, during which we count the "omer," originally a barley offering made in the Temple in Jerusalem. Nowadays, the count is increased by one each evening until we reach the number 49 on the night before Shavuot. There are many calendars, programs and e-mail services available to help keep track of that day's proper count. [http://tinyurl.com/ed56k] But my friend David Rothbaum in Kochav Ya'ir, Israel has alerted me to a unique one that uses movie titles of all things. The Movie Lover's Sefirat Ha'Omer Counter uses posters of movies with numbers in their titles to help keep track of that day's count. For example, click on Day 10, you get this: "Today is 10 days (accompanied by a poster for the TEN Commandments), which is one week (ONE Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest) and three days (THREE Amigos) of the Omer." [http://bangitout.com/movieomer/10.html]

Do you have a favourite Jewish or Israeli website, blog or podcast? Or have you created one yourself? Tell me about it at the address below and I may mention it in a future column.

U.S. anchor discusses his Judaism

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

When former CNN anchor Aaron Brown was 13 years old, his rabbi in Minneapolis, Minn., told him that a reporter's job is "to give voice to the voiceless."

"Think of our history and all of those centuries when no one heard us," said the rabbi, whom Brown counts as a significant figure in his life. "Think of how different Jewish history would be if in all the times we had been stifled, someone heard us."

It's a principle the veteran U.S. journalist said has guided him throughout his career – and particularly as he's covered the Middle East, even if it's sometimes alienated him from his fellow Jews.

Both Palestinians and Israelis are entitled to a voice, he told the annual UJA Federation donor dinner, May 4 at the Four Seasons Hotel.

"I've done that knowing that neither side would embrace me, and that the rejection of one side, particularly, would be especially painful," he said in a 30-minute speech to 450 guests. "In the end, we all want the love of our families, and I'm no exception. I want to be embraced by my people, because I'm one of them."

Brown – who was once CNN's lead anchor and host of Newsnight with Aaron Brown, but was replaced last year by Anderson Cooper – said he has often felt pressured by other Jews to stifle what could be seen as criticism of Israel.

"There is no tougher issue to report on than the Middle East," he said.

Brown recalled doing a story about checkpoints in Israel that examined both the Israeli and the Palestinian positions.

Soon afterward, he received two e-mails almost simultaneously. The first was from "someone of Arab descent," who wrote, "You are a Zionist pig. Just another tool of the Israelis."

The second came from a Jewish doctor, in Denver, Colo. "'You are,' he said to me, 'not better than a concentration camp kapo, selling out his people for money.'"

Brown wrote back: "'At worst, what we have here is an editorial disagreement about the decision I made. That's the worst thing that we have here, and your words were offensive beyond the pale.' And to his credit, he wrote back and apologized, and we remain in touch today."

Brown also spoke of growing up in Hopkins, Minn., near Minneapolis, as one of only a few Jews. "We weren't particularly theologically Jewish, but we understood what it meant."

His maternal grandparents came to the United States from Ukraine and settled in the Minneapolis-St. Paul area.

He said he's made it a tradition to take his 17-year-old daughter each year to Ellis Island in New York City, where they sit in the Great Hall and talk about how his grandparents "came here, how they lived, how they made their lives, what it must've been like, the courage that they had, the fierceness it must have taken."

He added, "Someday, I hope, she will take her children there and tell the story of her great-grandparents that she never knew."

Referring to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Brown said that "the Israeli side is easier to understand," since Israelis "see their future not in a pipe dream of a greater Israel, but in a two-state solution that will ultimately provide the security that they need and that they deserve."

He said Hamas' victory in recent Palestinian elections was not about most Palestinians favouring Israel's obliteration, but rather about a desire for change in the Palestinian Authority, which was "rife with corruption, slow to deliver social services, health care, education… and had no security."

Brown said the Palestinians voted for Hamas because of their situation, which they felt could not be worse.

"Of course, Hamas could be worse. And they turned out to be worse," he said.

"How can it be that young Arabs find more hope in a suicide belt than in democracy?" he asked. "Hamas understands really well what it means not to be in power. Now all of a sudden, they own a store – they have keys to the store. They don't know how to run foreign policy and they don't know how to run a country either. They do know how to run social services, however, and they certainly know how to run suicide bombers."

Speaking of the anti-Americanism, that is rampant in the Middle East, Brown said the Arab world hates the West because of its foreign policy, but not because of its freedom.

He noted that the United States has supported corrupt governments that have denied citizens basic rights.

"And that has to change," he said.

Brown added that Iran has become further radicalized since 9/11, and "whacking Iran will make attacking Iraq seem like child's play."

In an interview after his speech, Brown said both Palestinians and Israelis have a common desire for peace, but "no one is quite willing to start the process."

He added: "The end is quite clear. The Palestinians will get most of the West Bank and it will be less contiguous than it probably ought to be, certainly than they want. East Jerusalem needs to be dealt with. But by and large, I think both sides know what the final map will look like

"It's totally backwards to how every negotiation works. In every negotiation, starting is easy and ending is hard. This one, you know the end and you can't start it."

גידי קורן וחברים

שמור על אמא

Jews in canoes paddle down the Don

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Graham Fraser, left, Ellie Goldenberg and Sol Isaac tackle some rough water.

For the Jews of the Mosaic Outdoor Club of Ontario, weekends are about more than bagels and lox – especially perfect, sunny Sunday mornings like May 7, which dawned clear and cool.

For them, it was a great day to canoe into the heart of Toronto.

"It's gorgeous weather. I love canoeing," said Mosaic president Norm Abrams. "It's right up our mandate!"

In two rented canoes, Abrams and five other Mosaic members looked like all the other expectant paddlers waiting to start the Toronto and Region Conservation Authority's (TRCA) annual Paddle the Don, a 2½-hour trip down the Don River that includes three portages and several patches of rough water. The event is so popular that the TRCA schedules launch windows for each canoe so the event doesn't turn into a free-for-all.

This was the first trip down the Don for all six Mosaic members, but event leaders Lynne Morris and Graham Fraser weren't worried – they have plenty of canoeing experience, and many Mosaic events include instructional and safety components to help newcomers get off on the right foot.

Mosaic's goals are four-fold: get outside, get active, help the environment and do it all in a Jewish way.

The group, which is affiliated with the Florida-based Mosaic Outdoor Clubs of America, has 125 members, plus hundreds more who receive e-mail updates and participate occasionally (most events, except weekend trips, are open to non-members).

Almost every Sunday, all year round, there's something going on – day hikes, bike rides, and canoe trips in the summer; and skiing, snowshoeing and skating in the winter. There are also social events such as dances.

"It's amazing that someone like me, who loves the outdoors, didn't know about this," says Abrams, who only joined a few years ago. As a non-profit organization, Mosaic can't advertise extensively, so word has spread slowly about the group, which is now almost 10 years old.

Mosaic's official Jewish content ranges from Havdalah services at weekend retreats to a discussion on "Talmud and Trees." Most events are held on Sundays, and Abrams rhapsodizes about socializing with other Jews while getting outside and being active.

"There's a common bond, especially when you're hiking," he says.

For singles, Abrams says, Mosaic is "a very non-threatening way to meet." Morris adds that in the six years she's been involved, "quite a few couples have come out of the club."

But Mosaic isn't just for adults. Many events are appropriate for older children who can keep up with an easy hike, or an easy bike or canoe trip (participants under 19 must be accompanied by a parent).

Mosaic's trips are vetted carefully to make sure everyone has the best possible experience. A family-friendly first was planned this year for Lag b'Omer, May 15, at Wilket Creek Park. It featured an easy walk around the park, followed by toasted marshmallows, songs and stories.

A little farther afield, an upcoming July 9 day trip to Rockwood Conservation Area, near Guelph, Ont., will give parents and kids the chance to canoe and hike together – and pick up hiking or canoeing skills, if it's their first time out. Non-members are welcome, and children can take part free with an adult.

Fraser, an experienced Mosaic paddler, said the Don River event in particular helped the group "put environmentalism in a Jewish context" and spread awareness about urban ecology.

Running from the Oak Ridges Moraine north of Toronto into Lake Ontario, the Don is considered one of Canada's most degraded urban rivers. Individual canoeists and kayakers, along with corporate teams, collected pledges to raise funds for the regeneration of the Don watershed. Projects in key sites are restoring wetlands and making the river more fish-friendly.

As an outdoor experience, the Don may look tame, but Morris cautions against judging it too quickly. "It was harder than we thought. There was quite a bit of whitewater… one canoe got quite wet, actually."

But there was lots of sun later in the day to dry everybody out, and Morris says the good weather at most Mosaic events is only natural: "We have a line in with the Boss: He likes Jews getting out."

Membership is $35 per year, while non-members usually pay $6 per event, and children are free. Other fees, such as canoe rental, may apply. Visit www.mosaictoronto.org for more information.

Paul Penna student names new halophile species

Hannah's Grade 5 classroom teacher and Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School principal Janet Nish-Lapidus agrees. "She is a very interesting, curious, intelligent young woman," said Nish-Lapidus. "I taught her last year and I know that she's a deep thinker, I know that she's a critical thinker. She's very thoughtful, and it would be all those qualities that enabled her to look at that task from different angles."

Hannah was rewarded with a copy of Strange New Species: Astonishing Discoveries of Life On Earth by Elin Kelsey.

The halophile species was discovered in the Great Salt Lake in Utah by science student Ashlee Allred. She is a member of a scientific team, led by biochemist Bonnie Baxter, that is conducting research on life in extreme environments on earth as well as other planets.

In a statement, Baxter, who also served on the panel of contest judges, said, "I think researching Latin and applying it should be rewarded. Other kids did look to Latin roots, but this combination is a smooth word, and I can imagine using it in the lab.

"Since this is the most UV-resistant organism that we've tested, I wanted to have something about its ability to survive sun exposure in its name."

Baxter added that studying the salsolis can possibly lead to greater understanding of how to prevent UV damage in humans.

Kislowicz tapped for top job with UIAFC

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Montreal Jewish community is losing one of its most senior professionals, Linda Kislowicz, to Toronto where she will become executive vice president of UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC).

Kislowicz, 54, has been executive director of the YM-YWHA, Montreal's Jewish Community Centre, for the past 4½ years, and has worked for the Jewish community for a total of almost 35 years.

She will assume the UIAFC job, generally regarded as the most powerful within the Jewish bureaucracy, on Sept. 1, continuing at the Y until August. She is replacing Maxyne Finkelstein, another Montrealer, whose appointment as the Jewish Agency for Israel's North American CEO was announced in December. Finkelstein assumes that post, which is based in New York City, this summer.

"I have mixed feelings about leaving Montreal, but I am excited about the opportunity to live and work in a new place," she said.

Kislowicz sees her selection for the job as part of a trend in North America and especially Canada of women being hired for top management positions within the Jewish communal service. "More women are interested and more women are getting the positions," said Kislowicz, who has watched the glass ceiling slowly crack during her career.

Women are still under-represented on the boards of Jewish organizations, she thinks. "We have a dearth of strong female leadership on the lay side. It's an area to be developed."

At UIAFC she will be working with a president from Montreal, Stanley Plotnick, a former president of FEDERATION CJA. Before going to the Y, a federation agency, Kislowicz was executive director of Jewish Family Services of the Baron de Hirsch Institute, another federation constituent.

Plotnick, who chaired the selection committee, said in a statement that Kislowicz was chosen after an extensive search.

"We are delighted that someone with Linda's strong background and experience, knowledge of the federation system and passion for Israel will follow in the footsteps of Maxyne Finkelstein, our current, exceptionally talented EVP."

Kislowicz will be relocating with her husband Joe, a management consultant in information technology. They have two grown sons: Howard in Ottawa, who has just graduated in law and will be clerking at the Federal Court of Appeal, and Barry, a rabbi in Cleveland. They have one grandson.

Kislowicz said she is looking forward to working with Jewish communities across Canada and on Israel-related activities, including the approaching 40th anniversary of UIAFC's fundraising on behalf of the state.

Kislowicz said she does not see her new job as being a fundraiser, but more of representing Canada in its Israel and international affiliations.

UIAFC is the umbrella organization of 10 Jewish federations and regional communities from Vancouver to the Atlantic provinces. It is a national Jewish fundraising organization and community planning body established in 1998 as a result of the reorganization of United Israel Appeal of Canada Inc. and the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada.

Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada-Israel Committee and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy are among UIAFC's responsibilities.

Vandals strike Winnipeg shul

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Worshippers arriving for Shabbat morning services at the Askkenazi Synagogue on May 6 were greeted with smashed windows and stones on the floor of the sanctuary as a result of an attack by vandals overnight.

The synagogue's gabbai, Sol Spitz, reports that altogether 81 panes of glass were broken as a result of the attack and a follow-up assault the next night.

The Ashkenazi is Winnipeg's oldest standing synagogue. The current building was erected in the late 1940s after the previous building was destroyed by fire. The congregation was originally formed in 1915 when the neighbourhood around it was the centre of Jewish life in the city. Today, there is very little that remains of Jewish life in the impoverished area outside of the synagogue, the Chesed Shel Emes and a Jewish seniors home a couple of blocks away.

Nonetheless, the old synagogue still has a daily morning minyan, a Sunday evening minyan and Saturday services. The rest of the week, the congregation combines with two other struggling congregations in the north end for evening services at the other synagogues.

Spitz reports that he has been getting estimates on repairs. Thus far, the estimates raise as high as $5,100.

"This is the first time that this sort of thing has happened here," Spitz said. "A neighbour came over and said that she heard the glass breaking and went outside to see two kids in their early teens running away.

"It's sad that this happened, but what can you do."

The damaged windows haven't disrupted the services. Except for Shabbat morning, the services are held in a smaller chapel area on the side of the main sanctuary.

Buffett's investment part of larger, untold story

Stories about Israel's economy don't often make news in Canada in the face of the usual intense focus on conflict-driven issues. But last week's announcement that Warren Buffett – the second-richest man in the world (after Bill Gates) and widely recognized as the most successful investor in the world, possibly in history – had bought an 80 per cent stake in an Israeli firm captured the attention of the National Post and the Globe and Mail.

Both the Post and Globe carried an Associated Press story on April 8 about Buffett's $4-billion (US) purchase of Israeli industrialist Stef Wertheimer's Iscar Metalworking Company in the northern Galilee. "The deal was the talk of the day in Israel… with the news media devoting more attention to the colossal sale than to the evacuation of Jewish squatters in the volatile West Bank city of Hebron," wrote Amy Teibel.

That Buffett chose an Israeli firm for his biggest investment outside the United States was seen in Israel as a great coup. It gave a large boost to the Tel Aviv stock exchange, while Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was ecstatic: "[Buffett] is the greatest investor in the face of the earth. He is not Jewish. He is not a Zionist. He is only saying that he supports the Israeli economy and sees in it what we, even in our dreams, hesitate to say."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Maybe so. But one careful observer of Israel's economy disagreed somewhat with Olmert's interpretation of Buffett's investment. Jim Lederman, senior Israel analyst for Oxford Analytica reflected in a telephone conversation about the meaning of Buffett's move: "He bought an Israeli asset to make money for his shareholders. He did not buy into Israel. The importance of this fascinating deal is more psychological than financial. Buffett is a businessman. What this deal does say is that since Buffett is renowned for purchasing companies with long-term prospects, this is a message to other investors that, despite what they may read about violence affecting Israel, he believes that Israel is a stable environment for the long-term."

Lederman cautioned against the spin that sees Buffett supporting Israel's economy for the sake of Israel, even if the result of his investment is exactly that. This may seem like splitting hairs, but Lederman insists it's a significant difference, and that appreciating the real meaning of Buffett's investment makes Israel even more appealing to other potential foreign investors, including Canadians. Investing in Israel makes good sense in purely business terms.

As isolated as Israel may feel in its immediate neighbourhood, the fact that investors such as Buffett – and companies such as Intel – are prepared to plough billions into the business sector shows that Israel is increasingly becoming part of a globalized economy as it forms alliances with other companies and countries far beyond its borders.

In turn, according to Lederman, Israel needs to take foreign investor attitudes into account in determining certain of its own domestic priorities. Foremost among these is its policy toward the West Bank, and even humanitarian aid to the Palestinians in Gaza.

This process has actually been underway for some time as the pragmatic centre of Israel, led by the business community, has asserted its political will. This is a largely untold story that deserves, and in fact requires, further exploration and understanding.

* * *

In the May 7 International Herald Tribune, Jimmy Carter, the former U.S. president and current peace activist, revealed an abysmal ignorance of Hamas' core rejection of Israel when he wrote that "Hamas leaders have refused to recognize the State of Israel while their territory is being occupied."

The "territory" that Hamas considers occupied includes primarily Israel, a point Hamas has consistently reiterated. It's astonishing that someone of Carter's intellect cannot seem to understand that for this extremist Islamic movement, the recognition of Israel and the existence of Israel in "occupied Islamic land" are inherently irreconcilable.

Hundreds recall rabbi who was struck by train

More than 400 people packed the main sanctuary of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham for a moving yahrzeit memorial in honour of Rabbi Levi Bialo, who was killed last May 16 when his car was struck by a GO train as he headed to shul for morning davening.

Rabbi Bialo, 25, was Chabad of Markham's young adult co-ordinator and a Grade 5 teacher at Cheder Chabad. He was survived at the time by his pregnant wife Shira and their son Schneur Zalman. Subsequently, Shira gave birth to their daughter, Chaya Mushke.

Rabbi Avraham E. Plotkin, director of Chabad of Markham, opened the May 4 event by noting how Rabbi Bialo changed the lives of so many of his students during his own very short life.

Rabbi Dovid Schochet, senior leader of the Toronto Lubavitch community, drew a parallel between Rabbi Akiva, whose final recitation of the Shema was interrupted by the Romans, and the tragic accident of Rabbi Bialo on the way to Shul.

He reassured the many members of Rabbi Bialo's family who had gathered from all over North America that his work would be continued, as was Rabbi Akiva's, by those who love him and by his students around the world.

Richard Steyn, president of Chabad of Markham, spoke of the work Rabbi Bialo did with young adults in the community and of his inimitable, soft-spoken manner, which he used to influence them in a positive way.

One of those young adults, Daron Odes, spoke of his personal relationship with Rabbi Bialo. He described how he and his friends had initially resisted the rabbi's overtures and how eventually Rabbi Bialo won them over, earning their respect and admiration. He spoke of how painful Rabbi Bialo's death was to him and his friends, and of their firm commitment to continue his work.

Dovi Bialo, the rabbi's brother, appealed to the crowd to participate in the writing of a special new Sefer Torah that is being produced in honour of Rabbi Bialo.

Rabbi Boruch Zaltzman, principal of Cheder Chabad of Toronto, spoke about the individual attention that Rabbi Bialo gave to each child in his class, and he introduced one of the rabbi's students, Sruly Steiner, who conducted a siyum, the conclusion of a tractate of Gemara, in Rabbi Bialo's honour.

The evening featured a talk by Rabbi Yossi Jacobson of New York on the topic of "When bad things happen to good people."

The evening concluded with an announcement by Rabbi Plotkin that the new wing being now being added to the existing Chabad Lubavitch of Markham building will be named the "Rabbi Levi Bialo Youth Wing," in memory of a man who dedicated his life to helping youth in his community.

Board of Jewish Education shaliach to receive award of merit

BJE's Natan Kandler chosen from 876 colleagues

By CARLA LANCIT

A Toronto-based shaliach (Israeli emissary) has been chosen from among nearly 900 colleagues posted throughout the Jewish world for a special award of merit.

The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas partner, recently named Natan Kandler, who is currently working at UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE), Shaliach Mitzvayen, meaning that he's the best in the world. The award is given annually to one shaliach in recognition of devotion and work to fulfill the mission and goals of JAFI.

"He exhibited several areas of excellence," says Julia Koschitzky, a prominent member of Toronto's Jewish community and co-chair of JAFI's education department, pointing to Kandler's ability to represent Israel in both formal and informal settings and his role in helping the Toronto Jewish community reach out to the city's Russian and Israeli-Canadian communities.

"We are all particularly proud of Natan and his achievements in helping bring our community together, and for his efforts connecting students, leaders and educators alike to our Federation, the State of Israel and their Jewish souls," says Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO, UJA Federation.

"Natan's first class in bringing Israel to the Jewish community," says the BJE's vice-president, Jewish Education & Identity, Yael Seliger. "He's so dedicated and very creative. He has a vision and he implements it."

Kandler's professional colleague Dani Fine, who directs the BJE NOAR program which is helping to integrate formal Jewish education with informal Jewish education, and at camps and youth groups, concurs. "For some people what they do as a profession is their vocation, but with Natan, it's his avocation," says Fine. "It's not just a job, it's his passion. Being the emissary from the Jewish Agency to Toronto is for him an all-encompassing life's mission."

"This is a great encouragement for the work we're doing here," says Kandler, who is the coordinator for Toronto's 41 shlichim—the largest delegation in the world.

Over the past year-and-a-half, Kandler has been working with Toronto-area schools, youth movements, and camps to "turn Israel into a major component of our identity."

The award-winning shaliach believes that the best way to promote Israel is to present it realistically. "By showing young people the challenges we're dealing with, they see ways they can contribute to helping Israel."

According to Kandler, this approach is more effective than the traditional idealized version of Israel as the land of the kibbutz and pioneers. "Our students are well updated and have access to all the information. We have to make it make sense for them, make it meaningful for them," he says.

This is Kandler's second posting in Toronto. From 1996-1999 he was a shaliach at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

Shelley Friedman, who was the principal of CHAT at the time, recalls Kandler's "tremendous relationship with the kids and with the staff."

"There isn't that much difference between what he says and what he does," says Friedman. "You don't find that in too many people."

While Kandler, his wife Orit, and their five children will be in Toronto for another year-and-a-half, home is never far away. "Walking down the halls of Toronto's Jewish schools, you feel Israel."

Affordable rental program a win-win situation

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

Several members of Toronto's Jewish community are benefiting from a joint initiative between UJA Federation and Kehilla Residential Programme designed to better their living conditions and, by extension, their lives overall.

Launched in 2004, the Community Affordable Rental Program (CARP) is providing clients of Jewish agencies in the Greater Toronto Area with reduced-rent housing in four apartment buildings situated on or near the Bathurst Street corridor. Grover Realty is the landlord involved in the project. CARP is a five year, thirty unit pilot project.

"This is a way of putting people in more affordable housing immediately," says Nancy Singer, executive director of Kehilla. "It's a win-win situation. Landlords had vacancies and people had housing needs."

Singer notes that in addition to providing affordable housing, the program brings people back into the heart of the Jewish community, where they have access to schools, shopping, and Jewish institutions.

Some of the beneficiaries of this UJA Federation-funded program include a single mother of a 16-year-old daughter who was living with an abusive spouse, and a single, Russian mother of one.

"I have more money left now for food and more privacy, too," says Lena, (not her real name) a recent immigrant from the Former Soviet Union. "Before this, I couldn't have my own apartment because I had no choice but to share."

"If I wasn't here, I would be on the street," adds Yossi, an Israel-born divorced male, who is currently receiving social assistance.

Another positive byproduct of CARP is that a number of these clients are now more involved in Jewish community life than ever before, including 16% who have joined a synagogue since their move, 37% who now attend a Jewish Community Centre, and 27% who either use or volunteer for Jewish organizations.

"In an innovative example of public/private partnership, Al Mintz and his partners at Grover Realty saw an opportunity to work with the community to improve the lives of vulnerable Jews in our community," says David Engel, chair of the board, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "They share with us a commitment to the core Jewish values of Tzedakah, Tikun Olam and Chesed. The impact of the program for participants has been positive, with both social and financial benefits."

Israeli expert mothers ancient tree

By HOWARD ENGLISH

Elaine Solowey may be the only living woman today with a 2000-year-old offspring. Not only that, but her creation could truly bear fruit.

Solowey, a resident of Kibbutz Ketura in Israel's southern Eilot region, which is partnered with Toronto's Jewish community, is the "mother" of Methuselah - a date tree, grown from a 2000 year old seed, discovered on Masada.

Actually, several ancient date seeds were found during an archaeological dig on the north side of Masada and they were turned over to Solowey because she is one of the world's most respected experts on rare plants which she raises and nurtures at the Arava Institute supported by UJA Federation – on the kibbutz.

As you might imagine, planting seeds that date back so many centuries isn't quite as easy as it sounds. "I first had to rehydrate the seeds," said Solowey, during an interview with Jewish Toronto. "I had to try to wake up any part of them that was still living."

And, at first, even Solowey was sceptical. "I've never tried seeds this old," she admits. "As a matter of fact, when my research partner said 'Now try to sprout them,' I said 'You want me to do what with them?'"

Most of the seeds didn't respond to Solowey's treatment of water and a special acid to wake up any part of the shoot that was left in the embryo. But one seed sprouted after being planted last year on Tu B'shvat (the traditional Jewish New Year for trees) and Methuselah was born.

Solowey's next challenge is to determine whether her fledgling tree is male or female – an important distinction because only female trees can, one day, produce edible dates. However, there is no genetic test to identify the gender of a plant like this, so it's just a matter of wait and see.

"We're hoping that it's a female and that, in four years, we'll get flowers that we can pollinate," she says.

And if Methuselah does eventually produce dates, what will they taste like? "I think they might be quite different," answers Solowey. "Apparently the Judean date was a very, very tasty date with medicinal properties." In the meantime, Methuselah lives in isolation, away from machinery that could mistakenly knock it down or the prying hands of curious tourists. "We don't want people taking pieces off it for souvenirs," cautions Solowey. "Methuselah has turned into a very famous tree, much to my astonishment."

Walk attracts Jews from GTA and beyond

Solidarity motivates participants from many communities

By CARL LANCIT

It's a bit of a trek from Barrie to Toronto, especially with three kids aged 4-10, but for Julie and Sam Smith, the UJA Federation Walk With Israel is well worth the journey down Highway 400.

"It's important," says Julie Smith. "The Walk With Israel brings Jewish people together from inside and outside the GTA, even those of us who may not live in the traditional Jewish areas. One thing about Jews is that no matter where they live, we share a love for Israel, and we want to show that love and our support for Israel whenever and wherever possible."

"The Walk With Israel has always been that one huge, fun-filled family event that we can always count on as a way to show that support," says Smith. "I've been going to it since I was a little girl, and now my two little girls are doing it with my little boy, and I hope that in 15 or 20 years, they'll be taking their own kids. No matter where you live as a Jew, it's important that we always come together for Israel."

This year's UJA Federation Walk With Israel will be held – rain or shine - on Sunday May 28th, beginning at 9:30 am at Coronation Park (the corner of Strachan and Lakeshore) and ending with the RioCan Carnival at Ontario Place.

The Walk is chaired by Nelly Zagdanski, Sara Zagdanski and Felicia Posluns, who is encouraging Jews like the Smiths, living outside of the heart of the Jewish community, to participate in the event. "We want them to come and meet new people," she says. "It's always good to feel the connection to the Jewish community."

Posluns notes that since the Walk is a whole day affair, it's worth the effort to make the trip. "If they can make it here, it will be fantastic."

"The Walk is the community event of the year, so if you have to pick one to go to, this is a great choice," says Sara Zagdanski. "There is a synergy that is created when we join together as a community to show our support for Israel. The pride, the enthusiasm and the ruach (spirit) is palpable in the overwhelming crowd that always turns out."

For Aurora's Carl Williams, a participant in the Walk With Israel for some 40 years, the annual event is more important this year than ever, with Israel's very existence again being threatened by other countries. "I'll be there with my wife and two girls, no matter what," says Williams. "We are Jews, regardless of where we live. What's an hour drive when it comes to supporting Israel, while having a great day with friends and family. My girls can't wait for May 28."

Each Walk With Israel "Nosh Stop" will feature music, carnival games and activities. Participants will be entertained by DJs from five different companies: Corey Mandell Entertainment, Superior Sound, Mint Events, Magen Boys Entertainment and Sole Power. Throughout the route, replicas of Arr-yeah the Lion will lead children on the Office SuperCentre Treasure Hunt.

The annual event raises money for at-risk Jewish youth in Toronto, Israel and around the world.

Paper Clips a hit at Toronto Jewish Film Festival

Shelley, Gerry and Andrew Richler made a slight detour while driving down to Florida this winter. What moved the Torontonians to stop off in Whitwell, Tennessee, a town with a population of 1,200 of all places? A movie called Paper Clips, which ran as a week-long series of student screenings sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto during the recent 14th annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Paper Clips is the story of a middle school in Whitwell, Tennessee. In an attempt to educate the students from this small, homogenous community on cultural diversity and tolerance, vice principal David Smith taught them about the Holocaust. When a student asked "what is six million?" the paper clip project was born to help them grasp the concept of that staggering number. "We must show our students that they can make a difference in this ever-changing world," says Smith.

Each paper clip collected by the students of Whitwell Middle School represents a life lost in the Holocaust. The end result is a memorial that incorporates a rail car used to transport Jews to death camps.

"The film is powerful because it starts in Whitwell where they knew nothing," says Cheryl Landy, director of operations of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival. "What people see is a film about a town that has no cultural diversity. They didn't know what a Jew was, what the Holocaust was. To see the complete transformation, how knowledge has transformed this town, is amazing."

Landy notes that while Jewish audiences are generally knowledgeable about the Holocaust, this movie is an effective way to reach non-Jews, especially children. "This movie shows that there are people who don't know about the Holocaust. We bring in children who may not know anything about the Holocaust, and they go through the same cycle of learning."

Jewish audiences also found Paper Clips moving.

"I found the movie very emotional. Thinking about it, I get choked up," says Shelley Richler. "Anti-semitism is so rampant, and then you see this little community, how they embraced this, and how it has affected not only their community but the entire state of Tennessee."

According to Richler, Whitwell "was just the way you see it in the movie. It's a little town, all white - real middle America."

Richler's son Andrew, 13, was deeply moved by the visit. "It was wonderful to see his reaction," says Richler. "He walked around, put his hand on the inside of the rail car. He said 'I just wanted to feel the people who went through this.'"

Honey Carr, past co-chair of UJA Federation's Holocaust Education Week, and a child of Holocaust survivors, says that Paper Clips showed her the potential even one conversation can have in teaching people about hate and anti-semitism.

"I've always firmly believed that education is the key component in helping to stop this ongoing cycle of hatred," says Carr. "Look at the tremendous accomplishments started by one teacher and a small class of kids who knew little or nothing about the Holocaust. Just by discussing history, they came up with this unbelievable project which became almost infectious."

Hillel honours staff, students

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Forty-five students and staff were recognized for their commitment to Jewish campus life, and University of Toronto staff member Nouman Ashraf was honoured for bringing culturally diverse programs to campus, at Hillel of Greater Toronto's annual awards night last week.

The awards ceremony, held at Ryerson University and hosted by Avi Shack, began with a speech from Hillel of Greater Toronto board of directors president David Rosenbaum, who congratulated the recipients for creating a community for the thousands of Jewish students on Toronto-area campuses.

"This evening is very special because it presents a wonderful opportunity to showcase the great leadership and talent of our students in the Jewish community, the faculty, and the administration in universities and colleges around Toronto," Rosenbaum said.

Rosenbaum made special mention of Ashraf, U of T's anti-racism and cultural diversity officer, who received Hillel's Founding Friend of the Campus Award, and thanked him for his work to create quality culturally diverse programming on campus.

Hagai Kuperman, president of Hillel at U of T and himself the recipient of two awards, presented the award to Ashraf, with whom he worked closely on a program called "Spirituality and the Student Experience."

He said that with Ashraf's help, the program was able to "offer [Muslim and Jewish] students the opportunity for all to learn from one another and discuss relevant issues over delicious meals. Although there are many differences between [Muslims and Jews], there are also many similarities and this series allowed for a collaborative effort between the Muslim Students' Association of the University of Toronto and Hillel to explore areas of interest and create a safe place to allow for students to get out of their accepted comfort zones."

Upon accepting his award, Ashraf congratulated the students and Hillel staff, whom he recognized for their role in fostering a campus community that is tolerant of other cultures.

"It is through leadership that we are able to bring students of diverse backgrounds to come together and celebrate both our differences and similarities," Ashraf said.

Zac Kaye, Hillel's executive director, said that although Hillel engages about 6,000 students a year in Jewish programming, there are still about 12,000 that have yet to be reached.

"We're reaching out and connecting with as many people as we can and we hope more and more people will become involved with the community," he said.

As a testament to the hard work of Hillel students and staff, a montage of music and photography was presented to highlight the many events and programs organized by Hillel, such as a trip in January to Mississippi to repair homes damaged by Hurricane Katrina, as well as IsraelFest and Shabbat dinners.

Know each day and let it dwell in your heart

By SHELLEY MILLMAN HERMAN

On one of the especially idyllic spring days that we have been enjoying lately, as I was doing my daily speed walk in a particularly beautiful park, a thought came to me. I was looking around at the budding trees, inhaling the fresh air, smelling the delightful floral scent of the flowering bushes, and I thought to myself, "I want to know this day."

It occurred to me that the word "know" is not commonly used to describe our feelings about a day. Yet the language of my thought was very specific – I wanted to know the day! As I continued to walk, I pondered the words that had come to my mind. I remembered that when the Torah speaks of a man and woman having relations, it is described as "and he 'knew' her."

Each day since that day in the park has been equally beautiful. We have been blessed with a spectacular spring season.

The Shabbat following my day in the park, I was praying the Minchah service, and the words on the page jumped out at me. "You shall know this day, and cause it to dwell in your heart… [speaking of the Shabbos day]." Later on, when I was reading a fantastic book titled Beyond a Reasonable Doubt Convincing Evidence of the Truths of Judaism, by Rabbi Shmuel Waldman, it reiterated the same words, "You shall know this day…"

When I am in nature, I feel a reaffirmation of life, and of my existence. I feel God's presence as closely as I do when I am in synagogue praying. I look at the sky and all of the beauty around me, and I know that there is an ultimate creator – there is a God, one God who created this most incredible, beautiful, sophisticated world for us to enjoy and in which to feel His presence.

With each passing day of this season, my favourite season, when things are growing, when there is hope and a childlike optimism that everything will be all right, I long to know each day intimately. I want to possess the day, experience its joys and natural wonders – to take hold of it and make it my own.

How does one do this? I guess it's a personal choice. I have been spending more time bike riding and sitting outside watching my children play, and of course walking, for exercise as well as leisure. One day, my daughter and I walked arm in arm around the block, casually, relaxed, lovingly talking and sharing moments of each of our experiences of the day. We have to notice the day, from its early-morning gentleness and sparkling midday sun to the happy sounds of children playing outdoors after school, the slow retreat of the sun, and the quiet reappearance of the moon.

Each and every moment of the day has its own identity. How sad if it goes unnoticed. Do you want to feel alive? Go outside and experience God's splendour. After all, He created it all for us. Live it. Love it. Experience it. Know it. Know the day. Each and every day. It is ours to behold.

MDA plans Jerusalem Day fundraiser

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Robert Pilon, who played the lead roles in the Toronto productions of Phantom of the Opera and Les Miserables, will headline a Jerusalem Day event sponsored by Canadian Magen David Adom.

The program will be held May 25 at the Sephardic Kehila Centre, 7026 Bathurst St., at 7:30 p.m. Tickets are $10 each or $18 a couple.

Robert Pilon

A media release calls Pilon "one of Canada's most respected and sought after vocalists." He has released two CDs and has a third in production. Pilon starred in the award-winning television special A Canadian in New York, and has appeared as a guest star on other shows.

He sang O Canada at the Canada Loves New York rally held in New York City in the wake of Sept. 11, and has performed for such dignitaries as former New York mayor Rudolph Guiliani and Queen Elizabeth II. He has been asked to participate in the fifth anniversary memorial of 9/11 in Central Park this September.

For the past five years, Pilon has performed for the corporate world across North America and in the Caribbean, as well as for various charities in Canada and the United States.

The Jerusalem Day event's goal is to raise funds to purchase at least 200 computerized blood shakers and scale machines for Magen David Adom, which provides more than 95 per cent of all blood and blood components to hospitals in Israel and Israel Defence Forces medical services.

The equipment to be purchased shakes the blood donated (thus eliminating coagulation), monitors its weight and volume, and connects directly to the Central Blood Databank. The machines record all pertinent donor data for safety and quality assurance. Each blood donation is linked directly to its unique donor so that it can be tracked for future reference.

The keynote speaker at the event will be Alan Baker, Israel's ambassador to Canada. Also appearing in the program is comedian and story teller Allan Gould. Well-known actor Harvey Atkin will be master of ceremonies.

A limited number of tickets is still available. For more information or to reserve, call 416-780-0034 or e-mail cmda@interlog.com

Water buffalo meat ruled kosher by chief rabbi

By MATTHEW WAGNER
Jerusalem Post

How about throwing a water buffalo steak on the barbecue to impress your friends?

Chief Sephardi Rabbi Shlomo Amar would not object, and he might even dig in himself.

After two years of deliberations, Amar ruled last week that water buffalo (jamoose in Arabic) is kosher.

But before ruling the buffalo fit for the most pious Jew's table, the chief rabbi meticulously investigated the bovine's culinary history, anatomy and eating habits with the aid of Zohar Amar (no relation) and Ari Zivotofsky of Bar-Ilan University.

Shmuel Friedman, head of the Agriculture Ministry's grazing division, also helped Rabbi Amar reach the bottom of the water buffalo quandary.

As required by the Bible, in Leviticus 11, the water buffalo has split hooves and chews its cud. Also, Rabbi Amar knew, with Amar's and Zivotofsky's help, that Rome's Jewish community had an ancient tradition of buffalo eating (and that water buffalo milk is used to make the finest Mozzarella cheese). He was also made aware that veteran Israeli shochets slaughtered water buffaloes in Israel for popular consumption as late as the 1940s.

But despite this evidence, Rabbi Amar was cautious and strict.

He wanted to know whether water buffaloes have upper front teeth, since the Talmud says animals with them may not chew their cud.

The red deer has such teeth. Because of them, Rabbi Amar has ruled that the red deer is not kosher. His decision torpedoed an attempt by farmers to market red deer meat in Israel.

As the Agriculture Ministry's Friedman explained, "trying to market meat without rabbinic approval is a no-win situation. That's why we went to great lengths to get [Rabbi] Amar's approval before allotting more grazing land to buffaloes."

But six months ago, another piece in the water buffalo's kosher puzzle was solved. While touring the Hula Valley, Israel's largest grazing range for wild buffalo, Rabbi Amar was presented with a water buffalo skull that lacked the incriminating teeth. This last piece of evidence seemed to clinch the decision to rule the buffalo kosher.

But Rabbi Amar wanted to cover all his bases. He felt the skeleton was not good enough and wanted a freshly slaughtered head, not a skeleton.

Last week, three water buffalo heads were delivered to his office in the Chief Rabbinate. The buffalo was subsequently declared kosher.

The chief rabbi's decision was a blessing for Buffalo Farm, located on Moshav Bitzaron near Gadera. Buffalo Farm began marketing buffalo milk and cheeses less than a year ago in supermarket chains across the country under the kosher supervision of a local rabbi.

Buffalo Farm CEO Avi Zaltz said Rabbi Amar's halachic decision paves the way for the marketing of buffalo meat.

"We are negotiating with a few different people and we should start selling the meat in stores in a few months."

Zaltz said buffalo meat has a lower fat content than beef and would likely cost more.

Most Gaza evacuees compensated

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Most of the evacuated families from last summer's Gaza withdrawal have received full compensation, and more than 80 per cent have re-established their communal settings in new locations, Disengagement Authority director Yonathan Basi told the Prime Minister's Office last week.

Basi told PMO director Ilan Cohen that in the past seven months, some 1,200 new housing units have been built at 24 sites throughout Israel, and the authority has dealt with more than 3,500 claims for compensation.

Basi said the challenge facing the government is the need to resettle evacuated families in permanent housing while maintaining the communal networks they had in Gaza.

The meeting, convened to review the massive operation that relocated thousands and redrew Israel's borders, also discussed ways to deal with residents' lack of co-operation and uncertainty.

Cohen and Basi instructed government bureaucrats to keep investigating matters and submit their conclusions to decision-makers. These lessons will be useful if Prime Minister Ehud Olmert implements his plan to define Israel's final borders, which would require relocating thousands of West Bank settlers.

The government's current plan, whose timeframe has yet to be clearly defined, includes building new housing ahead of the settlers' relocation so they can move directly from their current residences to new homes.

Meanwhile, several greenhouses belonging to the former Gaza settlement of Morag were destroyed over the weekend in an attempt by dozens of gunmen to take control of the area.

The Palestinian Company for Economic Development, which is in charge of thousands of greenhouses that used to belong to Morag and other settlements, said the May 12 attack was the latest in a series that began almost right after the settlements were evacuated.

The company said hundreds of greenhouses and other agricultural installations have been sabotaged over the past few months, and it expressed its outrage over the phenomenon. The company also urged Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh and Interior Minister Said Siam to intervene to halt the attacks on lands belonging to the former settlements.

> Gunmen try to take control of land in abandoned settlements

"These greenhouses and other installations and projects provide a source of income for over 4,500 families," company officials said. "We are very disturbed by the recurring attacks and thefts. Such actions jeopardize the largest agricultural project carried out by the Palestinian Authority after the Israeli withdrawal."

In response to claims by some families about ownership of the lands, the company noted that Abbas had issued a presidential decree on the eve of the withdrawal to establish a special committee that would look into each claim if owners provided relevant documents.

The May 12 attack on the greenhouses, the biggest since the Israeli withdrawal, was carried out by dozens of gunmen from a number of families in the area. PA security forces opened fire on them, killing 21-year-old Rami al-Masri and wounding four others.

PA forces managed to regain control over parts of the greenhouses, PA security sources said, adding that the attackers caused heavy damage to most of the greenhouses before leaving.

"In the past few months there has been a sharp rise in attempts by local families and gangs to seize control over the lands. We are doing our utmost to protect these lands, which belong to all Palestinians," one officer said.

After the clash, hundreds of gunmen took to the streets in nearby Khan Yunis and opened fire on PA police. Four officers were wounded, one seriously, and three police stations were set on fire.

Militia from various groups in Gaza have set up training bases on some of the evacuated lands, further escalating tensions. Most of the camps belong to Fatah, Hamas and the Popular Resistance Committees.

PA interior ministry spokesperson Khaled Abu Hilal urged all the groups to evacuate the training bases "for their own safety." He strongly condemned the attacks on PA security forces and said a special committee has been set up to probe Masri's killing.

"We will find all those who attacked the police and we will punish them," he said. "We won't allow anyone to attack policemen and security installations. We will use weapons against anyone who carries weapons."

ISRAELI ICON DIES: Actor, musician and writer Yossi Banai, an Israeli cultural icon, died May 11 at 74 after a serious illness. He was a pillar of Israel's leading entertainment family and a giant of the Israeli stage and recording business. # Israeli Arabs voice their anger after immigration law upheld

BY DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli Arabs are upset after Israel's top court upheld a controversial law that prevents Palestinians married to Israeli Arabs from living in Israel.

By a vote of 6-5, the High Court of Justice on Sunday rejected petitions filed against the Citizenship and Entry Law.

While acknowledging that the law violates the human rights of the thousands of Israeli Arabs married to Palestinians, the High Court said national security must take precedence.

At least one of the Palestinian suicide bombers to have struck since 2000 was a resident of Israel through marriage, and Israeli Jews are all the more suspicious of Palestinians since they voted in a Hamas government earlier this year.

"The Palestinian Authority is an enemy government, a government that wants to destroy the country and is unwilling to recognize Israel," wrote Justice Mishael Cheshin.

But Israeli Arabs, who make up 20 per cent of the country's population, voiced their opposition to the decision.

"On this day, the High Court effectively approved the most racist legislation in the State of Israel – legislation which bars the unification of families on the basis of national belonging, Arab Palestinian," Adalah, the legal centre for Arab minority rights in Israel, said in a statement.

Adalah likened the ruling, which means that many Israeli Arabs will either have to live apart from their Palestinian spouses or move to the West Bank or Gaza Strip, to South Africa under apartheid. Israeli officials have long rejected such comparisons as false, given the open conflict with the Palestinians and other constitutional rights generally enjoyed by Israeli Arabs.

First passed in 2002 at the height of the terrorist attacks, the Citizenship and Entry Law all but banned residency rights for the Palestinian spouses of Israelis.

An amended version in 2003, when the High Court petitions were first filed, loosened the law to allow eligibility for female candidates older than 25, and men older than 35 – ages at which Palestinians are statistically far less likely to take up arms.

Then-justice minister Tzipi Livni said national security justifies the law. But she also cited growing fear of an influx of Palestinians seeking the better life on offer in Israel, some of them through fictitious marriages with Israeli Arabs.

"There is nothing wrong with looking to safeguard Israel's Jewish majority by law," she said at the time.

Her successor, Haim Ramon, said he would seek to enshrine the Citizenship and Entry Law in Israel's Basic Laws.

"The High Court ruling appears to apply to a certain population sector, but I intend to make a law that will apply to everyone," he told Army Radio. "Under the law, a citizen of a hostile country won't be able to adopt Israeli citizenship, except under certain circumstances that the state will determine."

Divisions expected to emerge

First, there's good news. Conference participants spoke of how the United States and Europe are working together in Afghanistan, how they agree on freezing out the Hamas-led Palestinian government and how they are united in standing up to what they called Russian energy "imperialism."

When skeptics attempted to find holes in this harmony such as detention of terrorist suspects in Guantanamo Bay or the dangers of global warming – U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Daniel Fried said: "The discussion of U.S.-European differences is so very 2003. We have done that. The U.S.-European relationship is at work and in action."

"No more talking of the problems between us," agreed Javier Solana, the European Union's high representative for foreign and security policy. "Transatlantic relations are in a good period. The patient is the rest of the world. Global problems would be in a better state if we co-operate."

Both Europe and the United States believe Iran has been lying when it says its nuclear program is not for developing a weapon. Both find intolerable Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's Holocaust denial and his threat to "wipe Israel off the map."

The United States has allowed Europe to take the lead in trying to negotiate away the Iranian nuclear danger, and both of them support the International Atomic Energy Agency finding that Iran has enriched uranium and defied a Security Council order to halt all enrichment activities.

The problem is what to do in response to Iranian defiance.

"The Security Council should impose multilateral sanctions," said U.S. Senator John McCain, "including a prohibition on investment, a travel ban and asset freezes for government leaders and nuclear scientists."

Europeans can accept such moves, but only if the United Nations imposes them. At the Marshall Fund conference, Solana insisted that the only coalition Europe would accept "is inside the Security Council."

In contrast, the United States is willing to work outside the United Nations. Rice has talked about imposing sanctions with a "coalition of the willing." The Europeans may not be willing.

Conflict across the Atlantic could become worse if the United States contemplates more dramatic action. When McCain refused to rule out military action – "the one thing worse than military action would be a nuclear-armed Iran," he said – Solana became agitated and said force should not even be considered.

The lessons may be grim. Yes, the United States and Europe have moved beyond their bitterness over Iraq. They share the same values and goals, in the Middle East and beyond.

But expect divisions to emerge on Iran. No one wants nuclear-armed ayatollahs, but the explosive, unresolved question is how far to push. If diplomacy fails to budge Tehran, the danger will become real that there could be a renewed transatlantic crisis, with Americans frustrated over European sniping and inaction and Europeans accusing the United States of imperialism and warmongering.

Israel Briefs

More Iranian threats

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad predicted Israel's eventual destruction. Speaking to students while visiting Indonesia last week, he called Israel "a tyrannical regime that will one day be destroyed." He also said Iran will press ahead with its nuclear program despite threats of UN sanctions. Earlier in the week, in a letter to U.S. President George W. Bush, he said the Iranian people don't understand "the phenomenon of Israel."

Israel sets deadline for talks

Justice Minister Haim Ramon said last week the Palestinians have until the end of 2006 to show they are legitimate peace partners or Israel will begin setting its final borders unilaterally.

Hamas, Fatah clash

Three Palestinians were killed and nine wounded in May 8 street battles between Hamas and Fatah militias. The clashes in southern Gaza were the bloodiest between the factions since Hamas crushed Fatah in January elections.

Soldier disciplined for snub

An Israeli soldier was stripped of his position for a politically motivated snub of the military chief of staff. The soldier, an Armored Corps sergeant who identifies with the religious settler movement, received a citation during Independence Day ceremonies but refused to shake Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz's hand in protest over last year's Gaza withdrawal.

Welfare of the Palestinians

Israel bears responsibility for the welfare of the Palestinians, although both sides are to blame for the human rights crisis in the Mideast, says Louise Arbour, a Canadian judge who is the UN high commissioner for human rights. The Palestinian Authority "has the urgent duty to do everything in its power to maintain law and order, prevent attacks on Israeli civilians, investigate those attacks that have taken place, and bring to justice those responsible," she said in Geneva. However, "as the occupying power," Arbour said, Israel bears responsibility for the welfare of the Palestinians, and she called on Israel to facilitate the entry of goods into Gaza.

Zeevi's assassins charged

An Israeli court has charged four men in the assassination of Rehavaam Zeevi. Israel snatched the men, who belong to the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, from a Jericho prison in March after the newly elected Hamas government said it would release them. Palestinians had detained the men since soon after Zeevi, an Israeli cabinet minister who advocated transferring Arabs from Israel and the West Bank, was killed in 2001, but they were never tried.

Buffett buys second firm

Investor Warren Buffett has bought a second company in Israel. In a $5- to 10-million (US) deal, CTB, a subsidiary of Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway, bought a 60 per cent interest in Israel's Agrologic, which designs and manufactures systems for agricultural use, Ha'aretz reported. Buffett made big news in Israel this month when Berkshire Hathaway took control of Iscar, an international metalworks consortium based in Israel, for $4 billion (US).

Israel saved Abbas?

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas recently cancelled a trip to Gaza after being told by Israel that he and an allied leader of his Fatah faction, Mohammed Dahlan, could be targeted by Hamas for assassination, Britain's Sunday Times reported. Israel and the Palestinian Authority had no immediate comment.

Olmert to address Congress

Ehud Olmert will address both houses of the U.S. Congress. The rare joint session, slated for May 24, will cap Olmert's first visit to the United States as Israeli prime minister. He will also meet with U.S. President George W. Bush. Olmert is seeking U.S. backing for his plans to unilaterally withdraw from portions of the West Bank.

Unlikely trajectory brings two men together

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

LOS ANGELES — With his muscular build, missing teeth, goatee and shaved head, Tim Zaal still has the appearance of the skinhead street brawler he was in his youth. So, it's fair to say he stood out like a sore thumb at a barbecue hosted by Matthew Boger for a group of his closest gay friends.

Zaal's presence at the party sparked plenty of questions: What was he doing there? What was his connection to the host and what were all those tattoos on his arms?

Zaal and Boger – a Hollywood writer could hardly have scripted an odder couple – are colleagues now, friends even, and so Zaal's presence at Boger's home was only a natural development in their relationship. But some 20-plus years ago, things were a lot different.

Zaal and Boger told their hopeful, yet stranger-than-fiction stories to visitors at the Museum of Tolerance (MOT), the educational arm of the Simon Wiesenthal Center. They often lecture young people about escaping the poisonous effects of intolerance.

Zaal was a very angry young man, pumped up in a steroid rage, running with skinhead street fighters, looking for gays to bash.

Boger was a 13-year-old runaway, thrown out of his home by his Bible-quoting mother after he came out and told her he was gay.

Zaal grew up in eastern Los Angeles county but at an early age, his family picked up and moved when the neighbourhood's character threatened to become more racially diverse.

He idolized his older brother, who rode a motorcycle and was the epitome of cool. When the family moved, his brother chose to remain in the neighbourhood.

He already felt prejudice towards African-Americans because of his parents' influence; that attitude was reinforced when his brother was shot. "I was led to believe that the majority of African-Americans went around shooting people," Zaal recounted.

He developed a fear of minorities, coupled with toxic feelings of anger and resentment.

As he entered his teen years, he developed a taste for punk rock music, which, with its slam dancing and abrasive in-your-face lyrics, fed his violent tendencies.

Violence was part of the scene, he said. As if slamming into each other on the dance floor wasn't enough, after concerts, punks often started fights with each other.

It suited his personality at the time. "I was a very angry person. The best way I can describe my mindset was that anybody who got in my way was a possible victim," Zaal said. "You had a chance of getting hurt."

Zaal's anger and resentment towards minorities led him into the racist skinhead movement and at one point, he served as one of white supremacist leader Tom Metzger's main lieutenants in California, responsible for recruitment and propaganda.

Gays were a favourite target for skinheads, and he and his buddies knew where some gays boys hung out – a local hamburger joint. One night, Zaal and his buddies decided to pay them a visit.

Boger picks up his story with a description of an unusual youth in northern California, near San Francisco. His father was a Hells Angel, one of the group's key organizers in northern California, and all his uncles were bikers.

He described his neighbourhood as white and religiously conservative.

One of five boys and two girls, Boger and a brother were sent at age 12 to a performing arts school in San Francisco. There he discovered other youths like him and he became aware for the first time why he was different – he was gay.

Discovering many other gay boys was a revelation "and I felt good about it."

When he returned home, he told his mom the good news. She responded with unexpected severity. "My mother said, 'If you're going to live your life in sin, you can't do this in this house,'" Boger recalled.

Thrown out at 13, he headed to San Francisco where he was homeless. "I did things on the street to survive of which I'm not proud," he said.

A few months later he drifted to L.A. where he continued his life on the street. "Even as street kids were trying to survive, we were planning how to get out," he said. "We knew we were throw-away kids."

He and his gay street friends would socialize at a hamburger stand and fantasize about meeting nice Jewish men. "We heard they were caring and would take care of us."

They knew there was a skinhead group out there that bashed gays, and they tried to avoid them. But one night at the hamburger stand, the skinheads found them.

Boger recalls seeing the skinheads "coming at us with so much anger in their eyes."

Although he tried to escape, he was caught and beaten.

"The last I remember was a steel-toe boot to the head."

He was unconscious for some time – it could have been a minute or 10, he can't be sure – and when he came to, he was a bloody mess.

Calling the police was not an option. He knew if they got involved, he likely would have landed in foster care until he was 18, a fate he wished to avoid.

Instead, he found a service station washroom, and cleaned himself up as best he could.

The physical healing took months, the psychological healing took longer, he said.

For years he lived in fear of public places and only in the last few years, the 40-something Boger was able to go out normally.

In 1998, he heard about a 22-year old gay man, Matthew Shepard, who was lured out of a bar, beaten, tied to a fence post and burned alive. Shocked by the murder, Boger eventually approached the MOT as a volunteer, hoping to do something to promote greater tolerance.

Zaal, meanwhile, recalls the hamburger stand incident differently. Where for Boger the incident developed slowly as if he was moving in molasses, for Zaal, it felt like an adrenaline rush. "For me, it went really fast. It was literally like a drug," he said.

It was a jolt to his system that "made me feel better. I believe it made me feel good about myself."

He recalled that his family had belittled him and that was one way of dealing with the anger.

The gay men he pounded were nameless and faceless victims. "They weren't human beings."

For Zaal, the incident at the hamburger stand was not an epiphany. There was no sudden realization that he was on a dead end path.

Instead, a gradual evolution drew him away from the skinhead movement. Becoming a father was a key development. He became concerned when his son's first words were mommy, daddy and heil Hitler.

"I knew in the back of my mind I was destroying this child," he said.

He broke up with his wife and moved for a few years away from the entire California hate scene. Eventually he met and married a Jewish woman and moved back to LA. He contacted the MOT after he saw one of his former skinhead associates speak for the museum.

It was at the MOT that Zaal and Boger – now the MOT floor manager – met again and exchanged stories. They quickly realized they had both taken part in the same incident so many years before.

"We came full circle here," Zaal stated. "By being here, I'm apologizing on a daily basis, not only to Matt, but to society."

"It's not easy to forgive," Boger said. "But to move on and heal, I had to let go."

Sixteen-year-old Israeli singer set for stardom

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

It's safe to say that Liel Kolet, a 16-year-old Israeli who grew up on Kibbutz Kinneret by the Jordan River, will likely be the next big international singing star.

It's not every day that a 13-year-old gets to sing in front of 18,000 people, as Liel, who goes by her first name, did in Salt Lake City three years ago – and that was just the beginning.

"I think that was my first big experience outside of Israel," says Liel, at a coffee shop in Toronto, on her way to Rochester where she performed for the local UJA.

Since then, Liel has performed for the Monaco royal family, Pope Benedict XVI, former U.S. president Bill Clinton, German President Horst Kohler and Elton John and recently performed with Andrea Bocelli.

At Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres' 80th birthday three years ago, "I sang Imagine [by John Lennon] and asked Bill Clinton to join me on stage, and luckily he said yes, and it was a really unforgettable performing experience," she says. "Since then, he's stayed in touch with us."

In 2004, Clinton invited Liel to sing at a Democratic party fundraiser. "He invited me personally and, I'll tell you, it's like a fairy-tale movie or something… [The function was at] this huge castle, just like in a movie," she says. "I sang there and I said, 'Don't worry, president Bill Clinton, I'm not going to ask you to sing with me.'"

Later this month, Liel will represent Switzerland as part of the group six4one at Eurovision, in Athens, Greece. The European singing contest, which is watched by more than 400- million people, launched the career of Ofra Haza, who represented Israel in 1983. Celine Dion, another contestant, represented Switzerland in 1988.

Six teenage singers from Europe come together to represent Switzerland for the contest, "to send the message of a better world," Liel says. Wowed by the idea, she says she "wanted to do it because it is really what I'm trying to do with my music."

Liel's first CD, Unison, was recently released in Switzerland and thousands of copies have been sold there.

The first single to be released from the CD, Lost In You, a rousing pop number with an Arabic influence, is being played on major radio stations and the album is being released in France and Spain, Liel's manager, Irit Ten-Hengel, says.

"We're lucky that she's having an album being released everywhere. It's really phenomenal, 'cause normally they release it in one country, and if it works, then they release it in another country."

Liel says her upbeat Middle Eastern sound in Unison is an attempt to bring her "roots – the Israeli sound, the Arab violins and the Arab drums – into the rock and pop melodies." She adds that her sound is "still familiar because it combines the rock and the pop and the European and the American sound that everyone knows with my own kind of style."

Liel caught the attention of Ten-Hengel, at 11, after winning first prize at a European talent contest in Italy.

"My manager was working at Sony Holland and it was always her dream to take an Israeli artist and to make them big all over the world," says Liel.

"[No one] could really do it except for Ofra Haza. They say I remind them of her a little bit, with my ethnic voice. At the competition, I sang one of her songs [Le'Orech Hayam]. I really connected to her after I won this competition."

But a strong voice, Eurovision, religion and nationality are not the only things Liel has in common with the late legendary singer. Liel also has North African roots, with three of her grandparents hailing from Egypt, Yemen and India.

Liel says the singer she admires most is Celine Dion. She recalls that Ten-Hengel, who took her to see Dion in Las Vegas, said, "Liel, if there is one person you need to listen to and learn from, it's Celine Dion."

Liel, who is away from Israel 60 to 70 per cent of the time, has no desire to emigrate.

"Life in Israel is a different life. Of course, you hear all over the news about the hard situation, but it's not always true. But, these days, any place is rarely safe. In Israel, you should know where not to go," she says.

"I live in a peaceful place on the Jordan valley and I love it. I don't know anything else. [My kibbutz] is on the Jordan valley near the Kinneret Lake and many kibbutzim are around, so I have many friends at the Mat Gan Kibbutz and the Ganya Kibbutz. It's not really a closed life."

Liel will be in Toronto, June 18, performing for the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center at the York Event Theatre. Tickets start at $100. For more information, contact Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center at 416-864-9735 or e-mail swcmain@pathcom.com.

Liel will return on Sept. 6, to perform at the UJA Toronto Campaign Launch at the Sheraton Theatre. Tickets are free. For further information, contact Herschel Perlis at 416-631-5717.

Tradition and rebellion clash in La Petite Jerusalem

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Karin Albou's La Petite Jerusalem, set in a heavily Jewish suburb of Paris known as Sarcelles, explores the dichotomy between tradition and rebellion.

Scheduled to open in local theatres on May 19, the film also delves into the topics of thwarted love and anti-Semitism.

In her debut as a feature film director, Albou handles these diverse themes deftly and with sensitivity.

Laura (Fanny Valette), the scion of a Tunisian Orthodox Jewish family, shares a crowded apartment with her mother (Sonia Tahar), older sister Mathilde (Elsa Zylberstein), Mathilde's husband Ariel (Bruno Todeschini) and their children.

In the opening scene, Laura, 18, is reading a Hebrew text, but appearances are deceiving. Laura is torn between her rigorous religious upbringing and her devotion to modern philosophy.

By contrast, Mathilde is serenely comfortable in the unchanging world of Torah. Mathilde, however, is concerned that Laura is straying from the fold by studying philosophy and paying insufficient attention to what she refers to as HaShem.

"Focus on Torah and the world won't be so ugly," Mathilde advises. "Pray more and it will be all right."

But Mathilde's admonitions have no effect on Laura, a precocious philosophy student attuned to Kant.

Much to the disappointment of Laura's family, she not only continues moving away from the strictures of Torah, but falls in love with Djamel (Hedi Tilette de Clermont-Tonerre), a Muslim refugee from Algeria living furtively in France without papers.

As these themes unfold, Albou shines the spotlight on Mathilde, who suspects that her pious husband is carrying on an affair. In a bedroom scene foreshadowing and perhaps clarifying Ariel's infidelity, Mathilde coldly turns her back to him when he tries to make love to her.

At the mikvah, Mathilde, having poured her heart out to a wise attendant, learns a valuable lesson in how to "pleasure" her husband. She discovers that good sex does not conflict with piety or modesty.

Albou addresses these issues with unbridled frankness.

As well, she touches fleetingly on the theme of anti-Semitism.

In a clear reference to the anti-Jewish incidents that have shaken France of late, Ariel talks about a recent attack against a synagogue and then urges Laura to stop her nightly walks in their mixed Jewish-Muslim neighbourhood.

Anti-Semitism comes up yet again when shadowy hooligans assault Ariel and a bunch of Jewish boys playing soccer.

Albou does not suggest that the assailants may be Muslims, who have been in the forefront of the anti-Semitic violence for the past six years.

As Laura's evolving but unlikely love affair with Djamel develops, he introduces her to his ethnocentric relatives. The meeting is extremely awkward, and when they finally realize that Laura is Jewish, Djamel's uncle urges him to drop Laura or, at the very least, to persuade her to convert to Islam.

La Petite Jerusalem, which was screened at last week's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, reaches its denouement as Israel and aliyah are brought into the equation. But here, too, Mathilde and Laura find themselves in opposite camps.

Graced by convincing performances from the entire cast, this is an intelligent and sensuous film that will appeal to many viewers.

ISRAEL LAUNCHES UNDERWATER MUSEUM

One of the world's first underwater museums opened in April off the coast of the Israeli port city of Caesarea.

Visitors may dive beneath the water and tour the sign-posted remains of the large harbour that King Herod built some 2,000 years ago to honour his Roman patron, Caesar Augustus. The underwater park was developed with funding from the Caesarea Development Corporation.

In the days of the Caesars, Caesarea was a major Roman port. A team of excavators from the University of Haifa's Recanati Institute for Maritime Studies worked on the site for some 30 years. Submerged artifacts include a Roman shipwreck, a ruined lighthouse, an ancient breakwater, anchors, pedestals and the port's original foundations.

"This port was built as the state-of-the-art port of the Roman Empire and made the other ports of the time – including those of Rome, Alexandria and Piraeus – look small and out of date by comparison," Sarah Arenson, a Haifa maritime historian, told the Israel 21c website.

According to Arenson, Caesarea's submerged harbour is the world's only ancient port that has significant remains on view and is accessible to ordinary divers. Four marked underwater trails connect 36 sign-posted sites in the harbour, all near the beach and between seven and 29 feet deep. The trails are considered appropriate for beginning divers, and one is even for snorkellers.

The port foundation was constructed with pozzolana, a type of hydraulic cement made from lime, rubble and volcanic powder found near Mount Vesuvius. The mixture, which hardens after contact with water, was poured into wooden frames, which were lowered into the water to solidify into the foundation stones.

Roman Caesarea was built on the ruins of Straton's Tower, a Phoenician town. It was built by King Herod, a prolific builder of magnificent structures, including the Second Temple of Jerusalem. The fortified city served as the capital of the Roman province of Judea for six centuries.

Bike Riding in Israel: Cycling aficionados may be keen to experience the Israel Ride bike tour, which offers two-week journeys that take in various natural, historic, archeological and cultural attractions as well as world heritage sites such as Masada, Tell Hatzor and Jerusalem. Three regional routes are offered: the Northern Circle, Mediterranean Breeze, and Mythology & Mystery.

A former environmental activist, Israel Ride's acting manager Yoram Asidon has pledged 10 per cent of company earnings to organizations that encourage cycling in Israel and abroad.

"This modest donation will be my contribution to the growing need of reducing motor vehicle dependency while promoting sustainable development in Israel," he writes. For details, please visit the website www.TheIsraelRide.com.

NEW CHILDREN'S BOOK BY SHARON ABRON DRACHE FROM OTTAWA PUBLISHER

Ottawa-based publishing house L'Dor Vador has published its second children's book.

The Lubavitchers Are Coming to Second Avenue (for ages 9 and up) is written by Sharon Abron Drache and illustrated by Jayne Lemon. It offers a Chanukah story set in downtown Ottawa's Glebe in the 1970s. The book sells for $11.99 and its launch date is May 28 at the National Library and Archives of Canada.

L'Dor Vador's earlier publication, The Magic Pot, also by Drache, is a children's picture book set in Toronto's Annex in the '50s. Acclaimed in these pages as "a moving story about the magic of love between generations," it sold several thousand copies. Drache's books for adults include The Mikveh Man and Other Stories (1984), Ritual Slaughter (1989) and The Golden Ghetto (1993).

Keeping in step with Canadian multiculturalism, L'Dor Vador's mandate is "the publication of literature about Jewish children who live in Canada." Its postal address is P.O. Box 4402, Station E, Ottawa, ON K1S 5B4.

Ragtime* Returns: Encore Entertainment presents a concert-style version of the popular musical Ragtime, which interweaves the stories of three remarkable families with historical characters and events of the ragtime era in turn-of-the-century America; based on the novel by E. L. Doctorow. The songs tell of a time of scandal, racism, immigration and love, all punctuated by the quest for justice. The 20-person cast is led by Sarah Haley and Shawn Henry.

Producer and stage director Merle Garbe noted that Encore is bringing Ragtime back to the place where Garth Drabinsky's Livent first presented it to the world about a decade ago. "Although our concert version is very scaled down, without the large cast and large set, and all the grandeur of the Livent production, our goal is to bring this powerful music to life and to give people another opportunity to experience Ragtime," she said.

Toronto Centre for the Arts (Studio Theatre), 5040 Yonge St. $30-$28. May 26 to June 4, 8 p.m.; Sunday matinées 2 p.m. No performances Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday evening. 416-733-0558

Names in the News: Yiddish novelist Chava Rosenfarb, longtime resident of Montreal and Toronto — and winner of the 2005 Jewish Book Award for Survivors, her collection of short stories – is slated to receive an honorary degree from the University of Lethbridge on May 31. As another honour, the English translation of The Tree of Life, Rosenfarb's acclaimed three-part novel about life in the Lodz Ghetto, has been shortlisted for an Alberta Book Award.

* * *

Comic Musical Returns: The Civic Light Opera Company presents A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum, the Stephen Sondheim musical that combines classic vaudeville schtick and slapstick comedy. Larry Gelbart and Burt Shevelove wrote the theatrical book after deriving inspiration from ancient Roman comedies.

Since the show's first Broadway opening in 1962, Zero Mostel and Phil Silvers have been among the countless funnymen to star as its Roman slave protagonist; a recent revival featured Nathan Lane. Fairview Library Theatre, North York. $20-$17.50. May 25 to June 11. 416-755-1717, www.CivicLightOperaCompany.com

* * *

Names in the News II: Vancouver-based musician, educator and choral conductor Elizabeth Wolak has won an award from the British Columbia Choral Federation for her achievements as an outstanding choral director and vocal teacher.

For 25 years, Wolak has been conductor and musical director of the Shiron Singers, a choral group dedicated to traditional and modern Jewish music. A Holocaust survivor who spent the war years in a Soviet labour camp, she was born in Krakow and came to Canada in 1963.

The German army's role in the Holocaust

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Wehrmacht: History, Myth, Reality* by Wolfram Wette, Harvard University Press.

A photographic exhibition titled "War of Extermination: The Crimes of the Wehrmacht: 1941-1944" opened in Hamburg, Germany, in March 1995, challenging a mantra about the German army and igniting a nationwide debate.

The gruesome photographs, which were subsequently exhibited in 32 more cities in Germany and Austria, showed ordinary German soldiers rounding up and killing Jewish men, women and children in eastern Europe.

As a result of the exhibit, the notion that the Wehrmacht had emerged from World War II morally unsullied was irretrievably shattered. The assumption had been that SS killing squads, in league with local collaborators, had perpetrated the Holocaust, and that the Wehrmacht had merely confined itself to fighting the war.

German historian Wolfram Wette uses the furor surrounding the exhibit to demolish this cherished idea. In The Wehrmacht: History, Myth, Reality (Harvard University Press), a first-class work of scholarship, he discloses that the Wehrmacht was, in fact, a willing partner in Adolf Hitler's genocidal plans for the "racial restructuring" of Europe.

That this was the case should come as no surprise. Long before the Nazis appeared on the scene, the German army was a hotbed of highly prejudicial views of Jews as well as Slavs.

At the turn of the 19th century, the officer corps generally displayed what Wette describes as "a fundamentally anti-Semitic bias."

Senior officers regarded Jews as socially inferior and politically unreliable and held their military abilities in low esteem. This attitude was particularly prevalent in Prussia, the state with the largest Jewish population in Germany.

Such was the atmosphere that, of the 26 Jewish reserve officers in the army in 1911, all had converted to Christianity. Despite the army's aversion to Jews, it placed no obstacles in the way of Jewish converts.

During World War I, Jewish men flocked to join the German army and acquitted themselves with honour. Twelve thousand Jews were killed in action, while 35,000 received decorations of various kinds. Nonetheless, Jewish soldiers were regularly passed over for promotion and anti-Semitic propaganda claimed that Jews were "cowards" and "shirkers."

In his new book, The Wehrmacht, historian Wolfram Wette implicates German officers and soldiers in atrocities against Jews.

In the autumn of 1916, the Prussian ministry of war issued an order that data was to be gathered on the number of Jews serving in the army. Jewish organizations were aghast, claiming that the "Jewish head count" was discriminatory. The ministry countered that it was not singling out Jews, but the decree fed into anti-Semitic beliefs, Wette suggests.

With Germany's defeat in the war, Gen. Erich Ludendorff, who had been the army's quartermaster, propagated the stab-in-the-back calumny that Jews had been disloyal to Germany. The theme was taken up with relish by the Nazis and milked for all it was worth.

The rising tide of anti-Semitism in Germany inundated the Steel Helmet, a conservative veteran's organization with a considerable membership. In 1924, a good 12 years before the exclusionary Nuremberg Laws rendered Jews second-class citizens, the Steel Helmet's leadership voted to exclude Jews. Theodor Duestenberg, one of its leading officials, supported the ban on Jews, But when he learned that his grandfather had been a Jew who converted to Christianity in 1818, he submitted his resignation.

Wette points out that the officer corps of the Reichswehr, as the German army during the Weimar Republic period was called, was riddled with anti-Semitic sentiments. After Hitler's accession to power, company commanders were required to obtain proof of the "Aryan origins" of enlisted men, and that led to the ouster of 70 soldiers of Jewish or partial Jewish ancestry. Nevertheless, thousands of soldiers of mixed German-Jewish background were permitted to serve in the ranks, at least until 1944.

Be that as it may, the Wehrmacht, on the eve of its 1941 invasion of the Soviet Union, issued guidelines instructing soldiers that the goal of the war was to "eliminate" Bolsheviks and Jews. Acting in that spirit, the Wehrmacht organized the massacre of 30,000 Jews at Babi Yar, which, Wette claims, was "the largest single mass killing for which the German army was responsible during its campaign against the Soviet Union."

He adds that the anti-Jewish propaganda permeating the Wehrmacht did not provoke serious or extensive opposition in the officer corps. Indeed, the general in charge of personnel, Rudolf Schmundt, issued a secret directive that read: "Officers must adopt a clear and totally uncompromising stance on the Jewish question. There is no difference between supposedly 'decent' Jews and the rest."

In contrast to officers in the Italian armed forces who usually rejected racism and opposed the persecution of Jews, officers in the Wehrmacht actively co-operated with Hitler's plan to wipe out European Jewry.

Wette quotes an armoured corps commander, Hans Rottiger, as saying that "the struggle against bandits" was waged with the ultimate purpose of "ruthlessly exterminating Jewry and other unwanted elements."

These notions filtered down into the ranks, and as Wette says, the majority of German troops believed that their mission was not only to preserve Germany from Bolshevism but also to impose changes in accordance with Hitler's racial concept of community.

After 1945, historians in West Germany paid little attention to the war and even less to the Wehrmacht, while former generals published memoirs whitewashing their respective roles. The legend thus arose that the Wehrmacht had kept its hands clean.

But in the mid-1990s, Wette observes, the Ministry of Defence in Germany published an explosive study implicating the Wehrmacht as "a real instrument of the National Socialist policy of extermination." The study noted that the Wehrmacht had played a decisive role in the Holocaust and had therefore carried out criminal orders.

The authors concluded with this damning indictment: "The Wehrmacht took part in the violent National Socialist policies, and its role increased as time went by. As the war continued, it was increasingly enmeshed in the crimes of Hitler and his regime."

To the best of Wette's knowledge, German courts did not convict any Wehrmacht officers of war crimes.

But on the 45th anniversary of the end of World War II, an army base in Germany was named after a sergeant, Anton Schmid, who had saved the lives of 300 Jews. Until then, the base had borne the name of Gen. Gunther Rudel, a member of the Wehrmacht's leadership.

The Wehrmacht is not the first book to have examined the German army's role in atrocities and in the Holocaust. But in the English language, none surpasses Wette's accomplishment in fleshing out the dirty, embarrassing, disgusting details.

B.C. camp for teens promotes Mideast peace

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — If you're a Canadian teen who is concerned about conflict in the Middle East, interested in filmmaking and consider yourself a creative thinker, chances are you're the right candidate for Peace It Together.

The brainchild of the Creative Peace Network Society, a Vancouver-based non-profit organization of facilitators, teachers, outdoor educators and artists, this summer program is seeking eight Canadian teens, ages 16 and 17, to join 24 Israeli and Palestinian teens in British Columbia for two weeks this August.

The youths will meet in Vancouver and take a ferry to Galiano Island, where they will be based at the Gulf Islands Film and Television School. Once there, they will engage in activities such as dialogue and listening exercises, leadership training, outdoor and wilderness experiences and creative projects.

They will also work in small groups to create original films about their lives, hopes and fears. The films will be screened in Vancouver at the end of the session.

"In the Middle East and around the world, Jewish, Palestinian and other Arab children are growing up in a culture of fear and mistrust," says Reena Lazar, executive director of the Creative Peace Network Society.

"Here in Canada, our communities are extremely polarized, and knowingly or not, our children also harbour within them much of the fear and resentment that typify the Middle East conflict. Peace It Together will address the seemingly insatiable need among youth impacted by violent conflict to find new avenues for hope, strength and joy."

Israeli and Palestinian youth laughing together in Vancouver during Peace It Together 2004.

Lazar was inspired to start the program after taking part in a similar one in New Mexico in 2003.

The first Peace It Together program was held in Canada in August 2004 and focused on conflict resolution, creativity and outdoor adventure. The new focus this year is filmmaking.

The cost to participate is on a sliding scale that ranges from $500 to $2,000. "But we won't turn away anyone if they can't pay that," Lazar says.

Peace It Together is being funded by numerous private foundations and is still seeking more funding.

The Palestinian and Israeli teens will come from around Israel, the West Bank and possibly Gaza. They will be recruited by Linda Divon, who heads up the Creative Peace Network Society's regional team.

While the aim is for participants to have fun in while in B.C., the Peace It Together program has serious goals.

"It will be an opportunity for them and the wider community to overcome stereotypes and increase tolerance, understanding and respect for the 'other,' increase awareness about the conflict and its impacts, foster collaboration to work toward a common goal, and become inspired and empowered community leaders," Lazar says.

"In other words, the youth will leave the program knowing that the 'enemy' is not really an enemy after all. They will leave knowing that there are some Israelis and Palestinians they can truly trust and who want the same thing they do – peace."

Israeli arts school seeks to expand

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

For being such a tiny country, Israel has produced an inordinate amount of talented artists.

David Broza, Itzhak Perlman, Amos Oz and Mayim Bialik are just a few of the hundreds of stars who got their start in Israel. Now, one Israeli school is hoping to share some of that talent with the rest of the world.

Thelma Yellin, an arts school in Tel Aviv, has recently launched an international campaign to attract teenaged musicians, actors and artists.

"Art is an international language," says Haim Daitchman, Thelma Yellin's principal. "So living in Israel with Jews, Arabs and Christians – it's something very unique."

Currently, the school has 580 students who take courses in classical and jazz music, drama, theatre, film and dance. The kids, ranging in age from 14 to 18, are from all over Israel including Haifa, Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. Since there aren't any dorms, a lot of the students commute for hours to get to the school.

"Having the students commute means a lot," says Daitchman. "It shows that there's a strong desire to be in the school."

Since 1958, gifted Israelis have been taking classes at Thelma Yellin, which was named after a famous Israeli cellist, but only now is the school opening its doors to students who live abroad.

"We have many graduates who are very well known," says Daitchman. One of our graduates is the conductor for the Berlin opera. It's about exploring the beauty of Israel from an arts perspective. And it's a good excuse for young people to come to Israel."

Before they can start signing students up though, they need to raise funds to build a dorm and several other new facilities. In order to secure donations, Daitchman and Simon Bialkovich, Thelma Yellin's director of development, and a former pro jazz drummer, have come to Toronto to talk to Jewish and Christian leaders about the school. They even went to CTS, the Christian Television Station, to pitch their project.

"We met with the president of CTS. It's interesting to see [their perspective] on supporting us. They see it as a way to bridge the gap between minorities," says Bialkovich at Toronto's Delta Chelsea hotel.

CTS isn't the only organization to see the potential that a more diverse Thelma Yellin has. Daitchman and Bialkovich hope to attract Arab students, and they've already met with delegates from Jordan to get the Arab world in tune with the school's program.

"The Jordanians were very interested in this program," says Daitchman. "Everyone can understand art and I'm sure we'll find the partners in Jordan and Egypt who think the same."

Becoming a student at the school has a lot more perks then just playing music or making movies. Every two years, the school's 75-piece symphony orchestra travels to Europe. They've played in Geneva, Brussels and most recently, Paris.

"Our concert in Paris last month," says a beaming Daitchman, "was a very unique one. We played at the UNESCO auditorium in front of 1,000 people who played 250 euro for a ticket. The president of the event was Roman Polanski."

While students in the symphony get to show off their skills on the international stage, these bi-annual gigs are also meant to promote Thelma Yellin outside of Israel. In conjunction with Daitchman's meetings in Toronto and other cities across the world, the school is hoping to raise $30 million. The money, says Daitchman will go toward renovations that need to be completed for 2008, the school's 50th anniversary and the year that Thelma Yellin will start taking students from the Diaspora.

"We'd love to raise financial support and strategic support, to build up the dormitories, an auditorium and more," says Daitchman.

"We're trying to raise capital," adds Bialkovich, a former graduate of Thelma Yellin. "That's why we have to create an awareness about the school. Sometimes we've seen schools that have a great rep, but from an arts point of view Thelma Yellin will be a much better place."

Bar Iran's president from World Cup: rabbi

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

LOS ANGELES — Rabbi Marvin Hier surveys the situation developing in Germany and can't help getting a feeling of déjà vu about it.

All the elements are there to suggest something of a replay of the 1936 Olympics, he suggests.

Like the Munich Olympics of 70 years ago, Germany will again play host to a sporting event of global proportions, this time the FIFA World Cup of Soccer, which kicks off on June 9 and runs for a month.

And like Hitler in 1936, another world leader, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is planning to attend Iran's opening match as a VIP to enhance his prestige.

Rabbi Hier finds that intolerable.

Rabbi Hier, dean of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center (SWC), has written to FIFA, the governing body of international soccer, and to the German government, asking whether it is appropriate for a person who has denied the Holocaust and called for the obliteration of Israel "to return to the scene of the crime 61 years after the Holocaust."

Speaking to a group of visiting Canadian reporters via teleconference, Rabbi Hier said, "It is too horrible to allow the return to Berlin of a man who would do the same thing."

The SWC has asked FIFA to "take a clear stand to bar Ahmadinejad."

FIFA's response has been inadequate – even hypocritical, he said.

FIFA has replied saying it does not engage in political affairs. The SWC released excerpts of a letter from FIFA legal director Heinz Tanner saying the organization "is a non-political association" and that Ahmadinejad's visit is the responsibility of the German government. However, FIFA has in fact taken a political stand, criticizing Israel for attacking an empty soccer field that was used as a training ground by Hamas, Rabbi Hier noted.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

"It is morally repugnant and certainly a double standard when FIFA can condemn Israel, but is silent and unwilling to say to Iranian President Ahmadinejad that he is not welcome to attend the World Cup in Germany because he has called for the obliteration of the State of Israel and referred to the Holocaust as a myth," said Rabbi Hier and Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the SWC.

Rabbi Hier said German diplomats have told him that as head of state, Ahmadinejad is immune from prosecution, but he has not received an invitation from Germany "and it's up to FIFA to invite or uninvite him."

It is imperative for Ahmadinejad to be embarrassed and repudiated by not being permitted to attend the soccer tournament, Rabbi Hier asserted. If in 1936 the world community had decided in large numbers not to attend the Munich Olympics, Hitler could have been weakened and he may not have felt emboldened to act aggressively on the international scene, he suggested.

"If [Ahmadinejad] is invited to a prestigious event, how do you get it through to him he's on the wrong track?" he added.

Meanwhile, news reports from Europe indicated several members of the European Parliament (MEP) in Brussels are calling for Iran to be banned from the World Cup and replaced with Bahrain.

The MEPs were expected to send a letter this week to FIFA President Sepp Blatter, urging him to take action against Iran because of Ahmadinejad's calls for the destruction of Israel, denial of the Holocaust and refusal to halt his country's nuclear activity, euobserver.com reported.

It is, however, unclear how many MEPs out of the parliament's 732 members would sign the letter, the web news service added.

In Israel, the Jerusalem Post reported that Jurgen Ruttgers, minister-president of North Rhine-Westphalia, Germany's largest federal state, said Ahmadinejad would not be welcome at the World Cup.

"We don't want anybody to create trouble," he said. "We want to have a nice and pleasant World Cup."

Germany would also not allow neo-Nazi or extreme right-wing demonstrations, Ruttgers told an audience at the Konrad Adenauer Center in Jerusalem.

Asked how Germany would deal with Ahmadinejad in the event that he carries out his intention to attend, Ruttgers said that he was not in a position to make an official statement.

All he could say in general terms was that Ahmadinejad was persona non grata in Germany, the Post reported.

"He is not accepted," Ruttgers said.

Olympic gold medalist among dignitaries at benefit

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Nearly two years after becoming Israel's first-ever Olympic gold medalist, windsurfer Gal Fridman is still making the most of his status as a hero to Jews both at home and abroad.

After recently celebrating Yom Ha'atzmaut on his first visit to Canada in the nation's capital, Fridman was among the guests of honour a few days later at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre Sports Celebrity Benefit held at Olympic Spirit Toronto.

"Israel has a long history of participating [in the Olympic Games]," he said. "It was a dream come true and a great honour to win the first gold."

After the Olympics, Fridman came home and sought out the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee to explore how as a national hero in Israel he could help Jews who were less fortunate.

The soft spoken 30-year-old from Karkur, near Hadera, developed a personal mentoring program through which he combines his mountain bike-based training with windsurfing instruction to help kids at risk realize the value of determination and goal-setting.

He meets with them every week, delivering the message that by believing in themselves and persevering they will be successful. Participants must attend school and not misbehave to qualify for the program.

"They have a special instructor during the week," he said. "If they don't behave, they don't get to do the fun activities with me."

The program stresses conditioning and discipline, showing the youngsters what they can accomplish through hard work and focusing on the task at hand. Fridman bikes with them and teaches them how to ride the wind on water, repeatedly stressing the role that determination has played in his success.

Last summer, the Olympic gold medalist travelled to St. Paul, Minn. where he lit the torch to start the annual JCC Maccabi Games.

Fridman won the 2003 Mistral World Championships in Thailand prior to his Olympic triumph and was a bronze medalist at the 1996 Atlanta Olympics. He is currently training full time for the 2008 Games in Beijing.

Fridman did not participate at the 2000 Sydney Olympics due to illness and took up mountain bike training during his time away, returning to regular training and competition in 2001. The biking proved to be beneficial in helping him sustain strength as a competitive windsurfer and get his message out to Jews throughout the world to keep the faith.

"It was amazing to see Israel on the news for something good," he said. "Jews around the world are used to seeing Israel [portrayed] not in such a positive way all the time."

Toronto Argonauts president and CEO Keith Pelley was honoured at the Sports Celebrity Benefit as the 2006 Miles Nadal JCC Sportsman of the year. He dedicated the award to the club's co-owners David Cynamon and Howard Sokolowski, who were in attendance.

Defending twentysomethings

Debbie Travis wasn't the first to say it and I'm sure she won't be the last.

This twentysomething generation is lazy, spoiled, undisciplined and seemingly allergic to hard work.

Sandie Benitah
20Something

It's hard not to be insulted by these sweeping generalizations, but I can't say I'm surprised, considering my view of my generation as the most misunderstood and underestimated.

In a recent issue of Maclean's magazine, Travis was quick to point out all that is wrong with our work ethic. Her new show is all about showing us how rewarding hard work and patience is. She wants us all to take a hammer and chip away at this air of entitlement we all seem to carry around.

It's painfully clear the beloved baby-boomer generation apparently still doesn't know just how good they had it.

Back in the day, good jobs were aplenty, with or without a high school education, never mind an affordable university education. If a woman loved children and wanted to teach for a living, she'd be as good as hired, whether she had a teacher's degree or not. She certainly didn't have to spend a year teaching English in China for an edge over the competition.

I don't expect Travis or people from her generation to understand how different we have it and how challenging life has become for us, but I absolutely can't tolerate her condescending attitude toward something she obviously just doesn't understand.

Oh, but she begs to differ.

"The young people who worked for me had this attitude that if they were told off, or if they made a mistake, they would just leave," she told Maclean's interviewer Linda Frum. "Or, if they had graduated from film school, they really expected that after two hours they would move straight to directing."

Well, excuuuuuse us, but take it from me, after personally having completed four unpaid internships and now working alongside interns as a full-time staff member, I can see both sides of the coin.

Interns are underappreciated and incredibly underused. Yes, someone has to photocopy agendas for the meeting, but perhaps it shouldn't be the person who wants to learn some "real" responsibility. But the truth is, anybody who can actually teach us a thing or two is too busy to spend time with us and so we're given the grunt work and swept under the carpet as a nuisance rather than an asset. It's easy to do when it's free labour. No money spent equals no time wasted — for the company anyway.

The designing diva certainly did get one thing right. We are the most educated generation with a huge percentage of us having pursued a post-secondary education. In many cases, we have more of an education than the people that hire us. Can't blame us for being annoyed. We paid an exorbitant amount of money each year for university only to graduate with 300 others who are equally educated, qualified and motivated. It's a tough job market out there and so yes, we're resentful when all we have to show for our hard work is a lowly gofer job at some prestigious office.

Of course we believe in paying our dues, but we just want to know when we have to stop paying them? Our education is more expensive, affordable housing is non-existent, gas prices are through the roof and companies expect you to work for free before even looking at your resumé. The American dream may have been a reality for our parents and grandparents but for youngsters starting out fresh today, it's become more of a fantasy.

Yes, we do have a sense of entitlement simply because we are entitled to something better — similar opportunities to those our parents, the Debbie Travises of the world, had. But we don't have those opportunities and all we are left with is our motivation. And sometimes our motivation just isn't going to be where it should be.

Toffee-Topped Cheesecake Bars for Shavuot

1 1/4 cup flour
1 cup powdered sugar
1/2 cup cocoa
1/4 tsp. baking soda
3/4 cup margarine, softened
1 pkg. cream cheese, softened
1 can sweetened condensed milk (not evaporated milk)
2 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla extract
1 pkg. SKOR Baking Chips, divided

Heat oven to 350°F . Combine flour, powdered sugar, cocoa and baking soda in bowl; cut in butter until mixture is crumbly. Press into bottom of ungreased 9x13 springform pan. Bake 15 min. Beat cream cheese until fluffy. Add condensed milk, eggs and vanilla; beat until smooth. Stir in 1 cup SKOR bits. Pour mixture over hot crust. Bake 20-25 min. or until set and edges just begin to brown. Remove from oven. Cool 15 min. Sprinkle remaining SKOR bits over top. Cool completely. Refrigerate several hours. Cover; store in refrigerator.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

Dear Ella,

Heather, a close friend of mine, recently met a new guy whom she is totally obsessed with. Every time she's in the company of a large group, she is all over him, and vice versa.

It makes people, including me, very uncomfortable. She sits on his lap and they whisper, giggle, kiss and recite pet names to each other. It's really quite obnoxious. Did I mention that she is not a teenager? We are talking about a 43-year-old woman.

About Life

Sometimes I don't want to invite her to come along, but she has been part of our group for a long time and used to be quite pleasant to be around when she was single. None of us appreciate this new side we are seeing of Heather, as it seems so incredibly juvenile.

How do I tell her that this behaviour is over the top?

Disgusting Display
Dear Disgusting Display

Everyone has their own gauge of how much affection in public is too much.

Some feel that holding hands or hugging is acceptable, while others feel only a quick peck is appropriate public behaviour.

My feeling is that anything that makes people uncomfortable is inappropriate. No one should feel left out, embarrassed or awkward around their friends, or anyone for that matter.

It's wonderful that the two of them are so happy and into each other that they seem to tune out the rest of the world around them.

You imply that Heather only does this when she is with a large group of people. Is it possible they are simply carrying on in public the way they do in private?

Either way, you shouldn't be made to feel uncomfortable. Heather needs to be made aware of how her actions are affecting others. Speak to her privately and explain you are very happy she has met someone she cares about, but she is making you all feel awkward. Ask her to tone it down a bit when she goes out with you. She may not realize the impact her behaviour has on others. I'm sure if she knew she was making others feel uneasy, she would think twice next time.

Bravo, God! A baby is born

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Miriam and I had a baby. Bravo, God!

On April 24, at 4:48 a.m., while most of you were sound asleep, little Noah River exited his mother's womb, came into our world leaving behind a direct handshake with the angels and the Almighty.

At that moment, motherhood was loftily bestowed upon Miriam and I accepted the glorious mantle of fatherhood.

I've always believed that miracles are occurrences outside of nature, but when I saw our seven-pound 12-ounce baby, when I witnessed his measured blinks, wriggling toes and fingers and heard that first cry that seemed to emanate from heaven itself, my view of them changed. I believed right then and there I was in the middle of an amazing phenomenon – otherworldly in nature – not much different than when Moses and the Jewish People walked through the split sea.

Our Noah is gold, silver and pearls. He is a living, breathing rose. A human orchid. I adore him, am in love with his steely blue eyes, soft and subtle lips, and his character, which accurately reflects the meaning of his name – calm, peaceful. And like most dads, my paternal hormones are on overdrive and I regularly kiss my little boy's nose, ears, fingers and bum. If I had a kiss-o-metre, it would register one million and six by now.

I am in awe of Miriam. I am because her passage through the gates of motherhood was heroic, no less than the biblical Devorah's victorious battle against Sisera. Through the internal kicks to the ribs she had to endure, her backaches, sore feet and then the pain of birth, she was all women brilliant and brave. (I remain upset, however, with the serpent in the Garden of Eden whose beguiling actions caused Miriam to hurt so).

The Torah says Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel and Leah were superior to the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in prophesy. Of course they were. Inside of their bellies grew little beings protected by an ethereal placenta of sorts, with one foot in this world and another in a much holier place.

Motherhood suits Miriam so well. I see that when she softly runs her hand over Noah's face as he sleeps and he is soothed. It is then I am reminded of a line from Sophie Tucker's' A Yiddishe Mamma: "There sat the sweetest angel, One that I fondly call a Yiddishe Momme. Tse kimpt nisht besser In der velt." (There is no better person in the world.)

And fatherhood, well it's coming slowly to me. Miriam told me not to worry and instead accept how I feel today as a father is the way I'm supposed to feel and tomorrow my paternal experience will be different. My love, she says, will change and grow every day.

We coddle Noah. We hug him. When I bathe him, I take off my shirt so that our skin touches. I want him to feel safe and loved always and I desperately desire the same for every child born at 4:48 a.m. that morning, the minutes before and all those after.

Miriam and I had a baby boy and the night we brought him home, I looked up at the sky and felt as though I was one of the stars. Now, as I write in my study, I hear his sweet cooing on the walkie- talkie while he naps. My smile is so wide, I worry that my face cannot hold it.

I am a father. Miriam is a mother. Noah River is our son. Love has engulfed us and all is right. Bravo, God! Bravo!

Artists' life-like murals transform rooms

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

What young boy wouldn't like a tour of the Toronto Maple Leafs' dressing room? Imagine visiting it every day and even sleeping there.

It's a fantasy for many young boys, but a dream come true for one lucky child, thanks to the artistry of Cherry Hill Designs.

Michael Gossack (416-509-9030), a principal of Cherry Hill, and his partner, were able to paint the boy's bedroom to simulate the Leafs' dressing room

The life-like painted murals include hockey jerseys hanging in a locker and actual replicas of the players' hockey sticks, says Gossack. "People think the shelf and bench are real, but it's all flat."

He explains that he conceptualized the dressing room project and worked closely with his partner to produce the life-like murals. "We even had the real hockey sticks to work from."

These days, the two partners are out in Brampton on a project to convert a 2,500-square-foot basement – complete with home theatre, wine room and spa bathroom – into a medieval castle under siege. "We're going along with the existing stone for a castle-like effect. We're going to use a lot of textures on the walls," says Gossack. "It's going to be unbelievable. We're doing 11 murals.

"There's this huge bathroom, so the toilet is being put on a throne, and we have fire-breathing dragons attacking in the theatre room."

A former sports broadcaster and talent agent, Gossack says he moved into mural painting and theme room creation because he has a knack for this kind of decor. "I always had a passion for art theme rooms; they're unique creations," he explains. "When you commission a mural you're paying for a piece of art."

Cherry Hill offers a variety of services including faux finishing, wall murals, cartoon characters for the wall and custom shelving.

"We do the characters out of half-inch-thick wood [and they] look almost three dimensional. We'll make your kid's room the best theme room ever."

Gossack says his partner is a painter who can replicate anything. "I'm working with a master. I'm getting hands-on learning with a master. I want to do as much painting as I can."

Gossack does much of the work, but his partner takes care of the detailed mural work.

"I'm on site. I oversee the project to make sure it's perfect. We make changes as we go along."

He says he generates most of his ideas by using such computer programs as Photoshop to produce blueprints for his vision. "There are so many ideas for rooms I can do. I can create a city. I'm dying to rebuild Bedrock. I can create the whole city out of wood and murals.

"As a former sports broadcaster, I have such a passion for sports I can create incredible sports rooms. I've been in the dressing rooms. I've talked to the players. I own the memorabilia. I'm not just working from pictures."

Mural painting is also a specialty of Guy Abergel (416-737-4953; guyabergel@hotmail.com), a freelance Israeli-born illustrator who has lived in Toronto since he was three years old. Abergel specializes in airbrushing and does custom work on everything from walls to motorcycles and cars.

"I've been drawing my whole life," says Abergel, a self-trained illustrator. "I've been involved in illustration for my entire art career. I never formally trained anywhere."

A natural talent, Abergel has taught illustration at the Thornhill Community Centre. He's also had a couple of comic books published

His work in private homes has ranged from children's rooms and nurseries to living rooms and dining rooms

"I can turn a dining room into a Tuscan garden terrace with columns and views of the Tuscan countryside."

Abergel usually works from photographs, he says. "I can recreate the exact image. No matter what people want, I can duplicate any image. I don't leave until the customer is completely satisfied."

He has also done a lot of commercial work, creating garden scenes and seascapes in restaurants and other commercial spaces.

Murals bring nature indoors

One of his commissions was to do murals for three different rooms in a multicultural youth centre and day care in Scarborough.

The wall mural at the youth centre captured images of former Toronto basketball star Vince Carter and other Raptors, he notes. "I used cartoon characters like Jimmy Neutron because the series has many multi-racial characters."

Abergel learned to do airbrushing from a video. "I bought a video and watched it about eight years ago. Airbrushing is the quickest way to make something look realistic. It's faster and more efficient than classical painting.

"I find with airbrushing the more detail and real the image, the better the picture. I can show the pores in the face and skin and a thin strand of hair."

Once the picture is drawn out, the actual painting is done in layers, he explains. "The paint dries instantly, so it's not forgiving if you make mistakes. It's much easier to correct your mistakes with oil or acrylic. They dry a lot slower.

"You need a very steady hand. There's a lot of eye-hand co-ordination with this technique."

One of his favourite home designs was a scene he created for a cottage up north last summer, he says.

"It had an amazing view of the lake. I continued the sky from outside inside the cottage, so even when you're inside, you feel like you're outside."

Generally it takes him two to three days to do a wall eight by 10 feet.

He notes that movie scenes and characters are very popular motifs for entertainment rooms. "I can do entire movie scenes."

Abergel says he works closely with his clients to come up with a design. "I can create whatever people can dream of."

Habitat for Humanity set to build its fifth home in York Region

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Habitat for Humanity, an independent, charitable housing program that provide affordable housing for families who can't afford traditional mortgages, is getting set to build another home in York Region.

Now in its fifth year of operation, the York Region chapter of Habitat for Humanity has already built four homes and will begin construction on its fifth next month in Keswick.

ReStore, an integral part of Habitat's success and part of a chain of more than 40 stores in Canada, is run by volunteers who accept donations of used renovation materials and sell them to raise money to help cover the costs of building homes.

The 10,000-square-foot York Region store, located in Newmarket, accepts doors, windows, electrical fixtures, lumber, kitchen and bathroom cabinetry, plumbing fixtures, paint, tiles, countertops, roofing, appliances, and furniture, which it sells at low prices, using the proceeds to furnish other homes in York Region.

"We do pick-ups from homeowners, bring it back to ReStore, sell it and the money goes to Habitat for Humanity," said store manager Joe Stirling.

What makes the York Region store unique is its Home and Kitchen Shop, which sells more than 100 used kitchens each year.

"When people are renovating their kitchens, we'll take their kitchen apart for free, and the people who donated their old kitchens will get a tax receipt for whatever we sell it for," Stirling said, adding that they will also save hundreds of dollars on having to pay a contractor to remove the kitchen.

Not only do ReStores across the country offer assistance to families in need, they're also environmentally friendly: the stores divert more than 10,000 tons of material from Canadian landfills each year.

Stirling said that this summer, volunteers are getting set to build a house in Keswick for a family of four.

He said it usually takes about 16 weeks to build a house, depending on the weather, and there may be between two to 10 people working on a particular house, depending on how complicated the job is.

"Ninety per cent of the people working on the homes are volunteers, tradesmen." He said, adding that students as young as 16 can help build homes while students as young as 15 can work in the store.

Stirling said that building houses for people who can't afford a traditional mortgage "gives people a hand up," but stressed that it's not a handout.

He said that while the people still have to pay a mortgage, it's interest free.

Recipients of the homes have to go through a selection process by the that determines who is entitled to a home based on need, ability to pay the interest-free mortgage and a willingness to give back to the community.

According to the Habitat for Humanity website, if a family is living in an overcrowded or run-down home, or their housing payments exceed 35 per cent of their gross income, they will be considered for a Habitat home.

However, although their family income may be too low to secure conventional financing from a bank, they must be able to make the payments on a no-interest Habitat mortgage.

The family must also be willing to put in the mandatory "sweat equity" hours to build their own house and other Habitat houses.

"The ones who are picked have to do 500 hours of volunteer work in the community," Stirling said.

The most rewarding part of his job, Stirling said, is being able to lend a helping hand to people in his community.

"Seeing the people, after the house is dedicated... They are a proud people. They're happy to have a new home, the kids are happy to have their own room. It's a very rewarding job."

Know your needs when shopping for kitchen appliances

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

[Photo courtesy of Caplan's Appliances]

Seeing a flashy ad for a high-tech oven or hearing a friend rave about a brand-new dishwasher will likely make a significant impression on you.

But ultimately, what really matters when shopping for kitchen appliances is knowing your needs and having a salesperson guide you to practical products, says Robert Caplan, of Caplan's Appliances (416-767-1655, www.caplans.ca).

"You want to make sure the salesperson is looking out for you," notes Caplan, general manager of the family business that's been in operation since 1944.

"The salesperson should be asking you questions like how you cook, how many people you're cooking for and how frequently you're using these appliances. With so many good products out there, the customer needs to be [informed about] what's practical."

Further to that, it's incumbent upon you to go into the store knowing the answers to these important questions.

"You have to be able to inform the salesperson," says George Alles, general manager of Tasco Distributors (www.tasco.net), which boasts five retail locations across the Greater Toronto Area.

"For instance, if you don't bake much, then you should be able to tell the salesperson that you're more concerned with surface cooking, and then you can concentrate on finding a really good performance product that's for surface cooking."

With knowing your needs as the first step, the next part of the process is learning about what's hot and why.

Alles and Caplan both note that stainless-steel and energy-efficient appliances are all the rage.

"A fridge you buy today would use about one-third of the energy of a fridge from 15 years ago," says Alles.

"They are now very efficient and also very quiet."

Caplan points out that there has been a shift from electric to gas stoves in recent years and the newest technology is induction cook tops, which functions by having a magnetic field induce a current in the cookware.

"It's a lot more powerful than gas or electric cooking, it's safer and it's more efficient," he says.

"It's a product that a lot of manufacturers are now [developing]."

Another trend in the world of kitchen appliances is what Caplan calls "kitchen jewelry," which is essentially extra features that aren't necessities but are useful.

"People are now buying things like warming drawers, built-in espresso systems or having wine coolers in the kitchen," Caplan says.

Alles says a growing cadre of clients are also inclined to purchase appliances that aren't that far off in size and scope from what you'd find in a restaurant kitchen.

"Professional appliances is a trend," he says.

"We're seeing people buying things like a Viking range, which is practically restaurant-sized."

Some final tips include knowing how much space you have to fit particular appliances and factoring in how many cooks there are in your household; and if you keep the Sabbath, be sure to inquire about appliances with a Sabbath mode.

The hidden costs of buying a home

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Buying a home can be quite the odyssey, especially in a hot real estate market.

Between shopping around for an affordable mortgage rate to finding the right home, many people would love nothing more than to just wrap up the deal.

But before that happens, certain pieces of the puzzle need to get done, including a home inspection.

"Consumers aren't usually aware of what's wrong with a home, which is why it's smart to have an educated eye see exactly what needs to be fixed or to make an itemized list that details what goes with the warranty," says Steve Balshin, a registered home inspector and owner of Majestic Home Inspection Service (905-886-2856, www.majestichomeinspection.com).

"It's exactly like buying a car."

Inspections typically involve hands-on examinations of major aspects of a property, such as the plumbing, heating and electrical systems, as well as the structural elements, like the roof.

Balshin says that depending on the size, age and complexity of a property, the inspection can last anywhere from two to seven hours.

They are done for brand-new as well as resale homes, and in many cases, real estate agents encourage prospective buyers to have the inspection performed as a condition of the offer.

Inspectors also help determine if problems in a home are covered under the Tarion Warranty Corporation program.

The program provides new home owners with one- to two- year warranty protection against defects in work and materials, while major structural defects fall under seven-year warranty protection.

Some of the major concerns that inspections draw attention to include mould and mildew, old-style wiring and energy issues.

"It can be very difficult to get home insurance if you have big risks, like mould and mildew or an underground oil tank," he says.

Balshin emphasizes that when seeking out an inspector, it's advisable to choose a professional who is registered and has a background in construction.

"If you hire a home inspector who is registered, you're getting someone who has to follow standards of practice," notes Balshin, who has inspected more than 44,000 properties over 29 years.

"You should also look for someone with building experience, like a home builder."

Whether it's a home invasion or flooding in the basement, a litany of troubles can occur in a home, and insurance can provide you with financial protection against them.

"You buy insurance to protect your finances," says Jeff Goldstein (416-380-2211), vice-president of Paisley Manor Insurance Group, which is celebrating its 50th anniversary this year.

"Our primary concern is to put you back in the financial situation you were in before the issue."

Goldstein encourages clients to not strictly focus on price when seeking out an insurance broker, but rather to pay close attention to the coverage features, along with the reputation and customer service offered by the broker.

"There are a number of us selling similar products, but the differentiation between us is the relationship we develop with clients," he says.

"Here, the reputation we've got is that we [provide] a high level of customer service."

A valuable piece of advice Goldstein offers to clients is to do a thorough inventory of your home and have the insurance company appraise what's in it.

"Look for a company that's going to do an appraisal on the house's [contents] to determine replacement value," he says.

In addition to home insurance, you may also want to invest in mortgage insurance.

"The person who purchases this insurance is usually the breadwinner who has an important contribution to the [mortgage]," says Monica Weissmann, an investment representative and insurance agent with Edward Jones Insurance (905-889-8535).

"If that person passes away, then their contribution to the family's income disappears. So mortgage insurance has to do with protection of your loved ones, by protecting your assets."

When trying to decide on the most appropriate mortgage insurance policy, Weissmann advises clients to carefully consider if the insurance coverage remains the same throughout the policy term.

For instance, if the mortgage amount at the time of purchase is $250,000 and 10 years down the road it is $100,000, you may still want the insurance coverage to be the original amount of the mortgage.

A certified financial planner, Weissmann encourages people to deal with a professional.

"People should consult with a professional and it doesn't have to be an insurance agent," she says.

"It can be a financial adviser who is licensed to sell insurance."

Persian rugs — beautiful and durable

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

If you're choosing an oriental rug for your home, the experts say buy the best quality you can afford.

Rahmat Babaiy of Palace Interior (416-323-3277) at 1255 Yonge St. just south of St. Clair Avenue, and Arthur Selyan of Selyan Flooring (416-781-2030), at 1783 Avenue Rd. north of Lawrence Avenue, both recommend buying the traditional hand-knotted Persian carpets made in Iran.

The carpets, which generally come in classic patterns of reds and blues, are known for their beauty and durability, says Selyan. "I tell people the carpets will last 100 years."

The carpets also increase in value as they age, says Babaiy, noting that a rug in his store from 1880 is now worth $65,000, and one from 1920 is valued at $45,000. A new rug of similar quality would be in the $5,000 range.

"You have to educate people first," Babaiy says. "People need to be informed about the product they're buying."

He says that some Persian rugs like the Qashqai or Bakhtiari are named for the Iranian nomadic tribes that weave them. Others like the Hariz and Hemmdan are named for the villages where they're woven. "The price depends on the quality. With the villages and tribes, the weaver works from memory. It's a cottage industry. One person may do the dyeing, spinning and weaving."

In contrast, Babaiy notes that rug-making in the cities is a business. He explains that the Persian rugs from the Iranian cities are more expensive than the tribal and village rugs because they are more detailed and they are often made of silk or finer wool, which also raises the price.

The quality of the wool also influences the price, Babaiy says. "Kurk wool, the sheep's finest wool, is used with silk because the fibres have to match. The first shear of lamb is also more expensive. Ordinary wool is less expensive.

"I can tell the difference by closing my eyes and running my hand over the rug."

Both stores carry rugs imported from the main carpet weaving centres in Iran, Pakistan, India, Turkey, Russia and China.

Arthur Selyan

The two men have considerable experience in the carpet business. Babaiy is the third generation of a family of carpet dealers who were originally based in Iran, while Selyan has been running his business since 1949. He also offers a variety of flooring options that include laminates, engineered wood, hardwood, cork, broadloom, linoleum tiles and marble and porcelain tiles.

Selyan says he's noticed changes in people's buying patterns for rugs over the years, noting that the decorators seem to prefer Chobies, rugs with more neutral colours made in India and Pakistan, "They like rugs in shades of beiges and golds. The Chobies are more popular now."

Babaiy says the Chobies are original copies of faded antique Persian rugs. "The carpets are combined with patterns and designs from older rugs. The thinner pile makes the rugs look older."

Selyan says that price is determined by the complexity of design, colour and size, and where a particular rug is woven. The selection of rugs in his store are geared to a wide scope in budgets, he adds. The choices are quite diverse. For instance, he carries synthetic woven rugs, but also available is a pure silk $15,000 Keshan from Iran.

He says a popular item is the Boukhara, a 100 per cent wool Pakistani rug with some silk woven into the design. The selection of Chobies also include the Vandie, a Chobi rug coloured with vegetable dyes.

Selyan notes that there are few requests for the thick 120- or 90-line traditional hand-woven Chinese rugs, but the Tibetan rugs, thick wool carpets in more contemporary design, continue to be in demand.

He says all his rugs can be cleaned. He recommends a special cleaner under the Selyan label for spot cleaning, and when necessary, he offers a service whereby the carpets are hand cleaned.

Palace Interior also offers hand cleaning, as well as a restoration and repair service. "We also trade in [or buy] old rugs," Babaiy says.

He recognizes the importance of excellent customer service and encourages his customers to try the rugs at home for 24 hours before they buy. "I say, 'Take it home. There's no charge.' If they like it they pay for it."

Selyan also allows his customers to bring the rugs home to decide if a particular rug suits their home. He also advises people to bring colour swatches of their furniture when rug shopping.

These days, Selyan sends buyers from the company to do the rug purchasing. Babaiy says he also does not need to travel as much for business. He explains he can get any kind of carpet for his customers because he works closely with carpet dealers around the world. "They know my inventory and I know theirs."

Selyan also carries a wide array of floor covering for every room in the house. If customers are unable to find a suitable rug, he says they can opt for broadloom carpeting, which is offered at very competitive prices.

Laminate, a floating floor with a 25-year guarantee, has become increasingly popular, he says. Laminates are actually photographs of wood with a protective cover over a high density fibre-board.

Also in great demand is engineered wood flooring – layers of wood with a wood veneer. These floating floors are widely used in condominiums because they can be applied directly over concrete, Selyan says.

Selyan also offers a wide selection of natural floors – pre-finished solid hardwood flooring, as well as cork tiles.

Cork is very warm and soft, he notes. "It's totally natural material. The cork tiles are also very environmentally friendly because they are a renewable resource."

People can see how the various floor coverings look at the showroom of the Selyan Flooring Warehouse, a 50,000-square-foot space at 112 Oakdale Ave.

Rejuvenate your home with quality paints

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

If you're thinking of giving your home a new look, why not change your paint colours, says Gary Zweig, of Reingewirtz Paint (416-977-3502).

"Painting is one of the least expensive and more effective ways of giving your home a facelift. You get the most bang for decorator dollar with a paint job."

And Zweig should know. He is the third generation working in the retail family paint business

Reingewirtz Paint was started by his grandfather Nathan Reingewirtz, who started the business from his living room on Baldwin Street in 1929

Zweig's father, Seymour, worked in the store for 50 years until his retirement in 2002. That year, Zweig, who has been working there since 1979, took over the business. He says Reingewirtz Paint is probably the oldest paint store in Toronto run continuously by one family.

The store, at 107 Baldwin St. just east of Spadina, has been at the same address for 77 years. But Zweig has modernized with the times and his customers can also find him at a new site – www.paintstore.on.ca.

"The web lets people look at colours and order paints in the comfort of their homes," he says. "We offer free delivery anywhere in the GTA."

Reingewirtz carries Para paint and has been a Benjamin Moore paint dealer for 70 years, Zweig says, noting that as a specialty retailer, his advice is based on years of expertise.

"We offer services like custom mixing and colour matching."

Zweig says the store has a professional painter/contractor on staff who gives free estimates on any paint job, and there is a colour expert who can do home colour consultations.

"The website is loaded with excellent advice and design tips", Zweig says. "We recommend contractors, we have questions and answers, and we can answer our customers' questions. We'll update you on the latest products and the newest colours.

"We also post our customers' before and after pictures. We're running a before and after contest. People can even win prizes."

One of the new services is computerized home painting of a person's room to test out a colour, he says, explaining that a customer can e-mail a picture of a room with a colour selection from the paint charts and he can send them a computerized preview, of how the selected paint colour will look in that particular room

He says he can also offer specials through Benjamin Moore "We have good deals on paints, and our prices on other products like brushes, ladders and rollers are very competitive."

He says Benjamin Moore paints are a premium paint with prices to match, but the better the quality the greater the value. "A good quality paint lasts longer and goes further on the wall."

He says one new product Benjamin Moore offers is a glaze with a metallic finish that comes in silver, bronze and copper. "You get a pearlescent glaze. It's a faux painting look without the elbow grease."

He notes that neutral colours like cloud white, and taupes and beiges continue to be very popular.

When choosing colours, Zweig often advises his customers to go a shade lighter because colours may look darker on the wall. "People sometimes think the colour is too dark. I have never had someone come back and say, 'It's too light.'"

Over the years, Reingewirtz has served many generations of the same family, says Zweig. "Now we see the grandchildren of some of our original customers. This loyalty is very gratifying."

Another Benjamin Moore dealer offering customers expertise and service is Coulter's Mill Paint & Decorating (905-760-8118), located at 1450 Clark Ave. W. on the north-east corner of Dufferin Street. Owner Paul Tane explains that he sells Benjamin Moore products exclusively.

"We're a Benjamin Moore signature store. We sell a full range of Benjamin Moore products. All of the staff is trained by Benjamin Moore Company Ltd. and have extensive training at every level."

Tane says it's important to understand the customers' requirements in order to provide the right product. "We assess the customers' needs by asking general questions – what they are painting, and [what's] the activity level in the room. We can advocate the right product for their needs and we're able to recommend products with their budgets in mind."

Right, Shaindel and Nathan Reingewirtz.

Benjamin Moore offers a variety of products to suit the varying needs of customers, he explains.

Benjamin Moore makes a paint in a pearl finish, which Tane says has more washability than the eggshell paint. "It's resistant to moisture. We recommend this for kitchens and bathrooms primarily."

He notes that there has been considerably less use of oil-based paints in recent years. "The performance of latex products has increased so much that the demand for oils is waning."

Even exterior paint is now available in latex, he says. "It has been engineered to withstand the elements."

Coulter's Mill also sells a special durable paint for concrete floors. "We have a proven paint system to control the problem of dust from a bare concrete floor." He carries an opaque product, which comes in a variety of colours, for painting concrete. We also have stains and sealers which protect and preserve stone and concrete."

The store offers a wide selection of products for decorative finishes. Studio Finishes is a two-stage system available in a wide variety of colours and creates a textured effect.

Coulter's Mill stocks a variety of wood stains and clear coat finishes from flat to high gloss. For painting furniture, Tane recommends Fresh Start, an acrylic primer foundation.

He says Benjamin Moore's 2006 colour collection includes a variety of looks such as Urban Loft, New Elegance, Global Fusion, Techno Savvy, Delicate Neutrals and Uber Luxury.

Light up your home for less

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

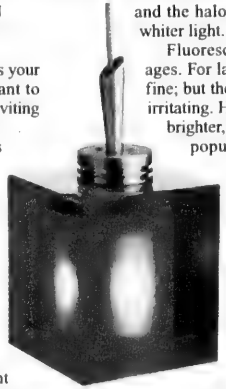
Good lighting makes your home more pleasant to live in and more inviting for guests.

As well, improvements in technology mean you have better light while saving on electricity bills.

Michael Gladstone of Royal Lighting (416-782-1129) recommends that before you decide what you want, you have a good look at the range of your choices. He itemizes just a few of them here.

The new fluorescent bulbs fit in regular fixtures. Coming in June is a four-watt fluorescent white chandelier bulb which gives light equivalent to 25 to 30 watts. Already, there are 13-watt mini-fluorescents to replace standard 60-watts in many fixtures; and the 23-watt bulb can replace the 100-watt in many table and floor lamps.

A halogen bulb can replace older incandescent bulbs in potlights. A 45-watt replaces a 75-watt, a 90-watt a 150-watt; and the halogen bulb gives you a cleaner and whiter light.



Fluorescent lights have been with us for ages. For laundry and cooking areas, they're fine; but they flicker slightly, which can be irritating. Halogen lamps, with their brighter, steadier white light, are popular for home offices, desk areas, living rooms and other places where you might do a lot of reading.

In your kitchen, halogen mini-pendants will do an excellent job illuminating your island or eating bar, and give a great look. Over the table where you eat, the halogen or incandescent light is most pleasant. "No one likes to eat under fluorescent light," says Gladstone.

The bathroom needs either a halogen or strong incandescent vanity light over the mirror. When shaving and putting on makeup, you want to see yourself as the world sees you. Potlights aren't enough, and they cast deceptive shadows. In powder rooms, where people don't usually shave or put on makeup, mini-chandeliers are popular and add an up-to-date look.

Not everyone wants a shower light. If you do, make sure it's waterproof and moisture-proof.

"Lighting needs are always customized", Gladstone says. Some of the relevant factors are the colour and size of a room, the location of fixtures, and the function of room.

Royal Lighting also carries a huge selection of fans. A ceiling fan will both cut your hydro costs and raise your comfort level.

By circulating warm air in the winter, pushing it down from the ceiling to where it can warm you, your fan cuts heating costs. Creating a breeze in the summer, a fan cools your skin naturally, decreasing the need for air conditioning. And any time of year, you sleep better with the air moving gently around you.

These suggestions make it easier to choose your furniture

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

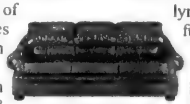
Whether you are renovating or moving into a new home, the furniture is central to the look of your house. As exciting as these changes can be, they are often quite daunting when you begin to make your choices.

Because choosing the furniture is such an important step in making your house a home, we have selected some of the city's best furniture stores to help you on your journey in home décor.



A landmark in the Jewish community for more than 48 years, Brooklyn Furniture (www.brooklynfurniture.com), which has been at 3742 Bathurst St. since 1972, offers beautiful furniture at affordable prices.

"Our philosophy is about offering the finest quality furniture at everyday low prices," says Louis Hochman, the store's owner. A family-owned business since it opened in 1958, Hochman took over from his father in the last few years.

Brooklyn's service is friendly and timely. "You'll always know who you're dealing with," Hochman says.

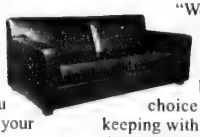
Offering the finest U.S. brands in furniture such as Stanley and American Drew, Brooklyn sells everything from master bedroom sets to mattresses to kitchen appliances. By cutting out unnecessary middleman activity, Brooklyn can offer quality products at lower prices.

Citing a warm, cherry-wood finish as one of the store's most popular sellers, Hochman picks up on the sleek and sophisticated look prevalent in today's home décor. With a wide range of stains and colours in the furniture it carries, Brooklyn covers all the bases in one-stop-furniture shopping. With the store's reputation for excellence across the city, Hochman says with a laugh, "Our clients are our best advertisers because they love saving a buck."

A leading force within the world of furniture, DeBoer's (www.deboers.com) has also established quite a reputation for offering the finest in quality and design. While there are seven locations in and around Toronto, the DeBoer's Studio at 1100 Sheppard Ave. W. offers the most in luxurious and classic furniture, as well as accessories.

With a well-travelled design team at the helm, DeBoer's guarantees that you will find unique, beautiful, quality pieces. And with extensive galleries carrying the best in furniture names such as Bernhardt, Drexel-Heritage and Henredon, the DeBoer's Studio makes for a perfect fit in any traditional home.

The most fantastic highlight of the DeBoer's Studio is its complementary interior design service. In the comfort of your home, its experienced consultants will create personalized floor plans for you. They will also help you decide among the many possible fabrics, colours and designs to make sure you find a look that is just right for your home.



"We cater to an ageless customer who wants to be inspired by their home and furnishings," says Pamela Davidson, the company's public relations manager.

The furniture offered at the studio is considered to be investment pieces, and you can be sure that the furniture is of "heirloom quality," she says. Whether you can afford an entire house or just one quality piece, DeBoer's has something for everyone. If you value a refined classicism in the furniture of your home, look no further than DeBoer's.

For a more specialized furniture search, Rawhide (905 531-7882) offers custom-made leather and fabric sofas tailored to your needs. Located at 7400 Woodbine Ave. in Markham, the showroom has every option in top-grade leather and fabric. With the help of Rawhide's experienced designers and consultants, dreaming up the sofa you want is completely up to you.

Since all manufacturing is done on the premises, any request you make can be accommodated. For example, if your dream sofa has a high back but needs to fit down a flight of stairs, Rawhide's trusted installers can assemble the sofa in your home. Using only the finest in imported leathers and fabrics, the company boasts superb quality at affordable prices.

"We can adhere to any budget", says Brian Green, the company's representative.

Green cites earth-toned leather as the most popular choice for leather sofas today. In keeping with modern home décor trends, these sofas avoid a bulky look and transform your home into a classic work of art.

With five locations across Ontario, including one in the Promenade Mall and another as far away as Hamilton, Home Edition (905-482-0882) offers a convenient furniture shopping experience. With the best in quality, imported brands such as Ashley, Home Edition sells everything from complete bedroom sets to accessories such as picture frames.

Catering to a wide range of customers, Home Edition has something for everyone. Guaranteeing superior value furniture, the company believes in selling quality products at a great price. Furthermore, the stores promise prompt delivery and set-up within less than one week of purchase.

With such fantastic options available around the city, decorating or redecorating your home may not seem so overwhelming. Whether you require interior design help, custom made sofas, tried-and-true furniture or beautiful accessories, you are bound to find exactly what you are looking for at one of these retailers.

Refinishing makes your furniture look like new

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

If you don't know a thing about refinishing furniture, Sandro Marcantonio of Marcantonio Furniture Repair and Joe Cabral of Carrocel Restorations can offer high-quality furniture for the widest range of budgets and tastes.

For both men, restoring furniture means more than just polishing antique wood. Carrocel and Marcantonio offer a range of services, and will work with decorators – or refer you to a decorator, if necessary – to make sure you end up with a piece that's a perfect fit for your lifestyle and home.

Cabral has been in business for more than 21 years, building up Carrocel as a family business. And while he apprenticed with his uncle and started the business with his brother, at this point, he says, "family business" doesn't just refer to his own family. In fact, "most of our business is referrals," from one relative to another. "We work for one family member, then go on to the next.

"We do everything," says Cabral, who specializes in restoring fine wooden furniture and oversees every single stage, including upholstery.

"As many as 25 individual steps go into the rich and long-lasting finish we're known for... [and we have] a selection of lovely fabrics, or we will work with fabrics you or your decorator have already chosen to co-ordinate with other pieces in your home."

Carrocel's craftsmen painstakingly stain, rub, pad, highlight, blend, antique and shade each piece inside and out. The goal of all that hard work? "A finish that illuminates and accentuates the natural beauty and grain of wood."

With inherited antiques, refinishing is a wise investment. "If it's older," Cabral says, "it's worth doing because the quality is there."

For those of us who aren't lucky enough to have inherited a relative's prized Louis XV armoire or Chippendale dining suite, Carrocel offers many already refinished antiques in its Markham showroom. And, there is also online shopping through its website, www.carrocel.com

Buying refinished furniture, Cabral says, means you'll "end up with something that's very unique that cannot be bought in a local furniture store."

Beyond wooden antiques, Marcantonio says he can work with many different materials and finishes. In fact, he says, he offers more services than you might think.

From general repairs like re-gluing a chair to highly specialized restoration – painting frames, gold leafing, hand-painted furniture – he can do it and more. He can even accomplish the seemingly impossible, like repairing broken stone and marble.

With marble tables, for example, Marcantonio says he's "rebuilt whole entire corners" that have been crushed or damaged. It's a painstakingly detailed process, an artistic labour of love. "You have to match the colour, grain and finish."

There's also hope for other beloved heirlooms, he says, like chandeliers, pottery, vases, even damaged statues, if you want a more sophisticated repair than Krazy Glue can accomplish.

One furnishing trend that's causing problems, he says, is imported furniture, usually from China, that looks exactly like wood, but is actually made of resin. If it gets scratched or broken, many people think there's no solution. But don't throw it away just yet. Marcantonio can fix that, too.

Marcantonio says much of his business actually comes, not from owners, but from high-end furniture retailers like The Art Shoppe.

When store showpieces come in damaged, with nicks and scratches from their journey, he's called in to touch them up and restore them on-site to brand new, salable condition. He'll also work on-site in customers' homes if they only have a few small items that need repair. Otherwise, he'll bring them into his repair shop where he can provide more extensive services.

Many people don't realize Marcantonio can also help them in other areas of the home. "Kitchens are very expensive to redo," he says, and it's often not necessary with good-quality wooden cupboards. If you don't want to rip out and replace what's there now, just refacing cabinets and drawers can make a world of difference.

He offers a "significantly less expensive" route to a space that looks and feels brand new.

Whether a job is big or small doesn't matter much to Marcantonio. "Sometimes I do small pieces individually; sometimes, an entire set." Like Cabral, what does matter to him is meeting your needs.

"It's very important that you make the customer happy," Marcantonio says.

Both hope you'll take home not just a piece of furniture, but also a smile

Interior designers help create a home you can enjoy

[Brian Murphy Design & Associates photos]

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

The biggest trend in interior design is actually nothing new. At the end of the day, you should have a home you can live in and enjoy, two interior designers say.

"It's not a museum, it's your house," says Brian Murphy of Brian Murphy Design & Associates (416-293-4917). "Don't worry about what's good for the public."

With 40 years of experience, Miriam Muller of MM Interiors (905-764-3737; www.mminteriors.ca) agrees: "I try to create homes for people, not a showcase."

Function is as important as appearance, says Murphy, especially in the kitchen. "If it is not planned properly, it's a disaster... there's a four-mile trek from the fridge to the sink. You aren't able to get anything into those corner cupboards... just a mess of pots you can't get at."

Sometimes small changes can make the difference between living in a home and loving to live in that same home.

"People don't believe it's the same house," Muller says. "Just by moving furniture and rearranging accents in the room, [you can make] the whole place look very different."

She also offers low-budget facelifts for realtors who need a quick upgrade before putting a house on the market.

Murphy's long experience includes more than 25 years as a landscaper. He loves planning a home both inside and out. "I'm the first designer who can design from the front fence to the back fence and everything in between... pool, cabana and bathroom."

Premium paints offer value

He stresses that neutrals are still very popular, but there are more neutrals in darker colours to support the use of natural architectural elements like wood and granite. "The deeper tones enhance the drama of the natural elements."

Tane notes that there are advantages to using a premium paint like Benjamin Moore. "It offers tremendous value because you get more coverage per gallon and a greater ease of application." The paint does not fade or change colour over time and there's a 15-year colour retention.

Tane also says that the VOC, or volatile organic compound fumes, of Benjamin Moore paints are among the lowest in the industry. "Benjamin Moore's Eco-spec is often used for nurseries. Parents don't want their babies to be exposed to fumes. It performs well in all sheen levels."

He recommends washing eggshell paint with diluted liquid soap on a soft white cloth.

The store has a computerized customer data system. "It's really an advantage for people who want to do touch-ups, but don't remember what they bought."

In addition to paint, the store sells furniture accessories and window coverings, which have been personally selected by Tane's wife, Melva Villanueva, an award winning interior designer.

"She's put together a fantastic array of furniture, accessories, window coverings and wallpaper," Tane says.

"We offer expert consultation on home décor and personalized service. We can help you achieve your vision."

Mortgage brokers can get you to the bank – and beyond

By DAVID GROSSMAN
Special to The CJN

Many people think the only worthwhile place to get a mortgage is a bank. And banks are great mortgage lenders. Even though their lending guidelines are strict, if you meet the criteria, why shouldn't you get your mortgage from one?

But you want the best rates and terms, don't you? Mortgage brokers deal with banks and with many other reputable lending institutions. And even if you choose to engage the services of a mortgage broker, you can still get your mortgage from a bank.

A broker can help you find you the best available mortgage because he or she has access to the lenders' best discounted rates. Mortgage brokers also know what specials each bank is offering at any given time, and that can save you the hassle of having to shop your mortgage around to multiple banks in a quest to find the best deal.

Now, if your application doesn't measure up to the lending guidelines of the bank, where do you go?

Some people think that if you have trouble qualifying at a bank, the only place you can go is to private lenders who will charge you high rates and exorbitant fees.

But that's not true. There are a growing number of alternative institutional lenders whose mandate is to serve customers with needs that aren't met by banks, and their mortgage products are usually rated at just a small premium above those of the banks.

Why would anyone want to consider getting a mortgage from any place other than a bank?

Banks are very strict when it comes to determining your maximum mortgage amount. But what if, based on your income, you would like a larger mortgage than what a bank will allow?

Self-employed people often have a difficult time obtaining mortgage financing because they don't show a lot of personal income – for tax purposes, self-employed people usually retain much of their income in their businesses. What options are available? Many. As an example, one of my company's lenders has a program that will extend credit to self-employed applicants without any requirement for income verification and with as little as a five per cent down payment.

Have you ever been to the bank to apply for a mortgage during, or soon after, a financial hardship? Because of strict lending guidelines at the banks, this may not be a very simple task.

A couple who were having a difficult time qualifying for a mortgage at their bank recently came to me for help. They wanted to purchase a larger home for their growing family and had saved a considerable down payment. The couple was well on their way to recovering from a business loss – they were both employed in stable jobs. However, the wife hadn't yet re-established her credit after a consumer proposal (a consumer proposal is similar to a bankruptcy except that the debtor is responsible for paying a portion of his or her debt). We were able to help the couple obtain financing from an alternate lender at just a small premium above the banks' fully discounted rates.

A good mortgage broker will know which lending institution or institutions to take your application to and how to present your application to help you find the best available mortgage rate and terms.

A pool can make a backyard, and Rubaroc keeps it safe

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

The backyard isn't just a place to stash a barbecue anymore. With better patio equipment, lighting and even more sophisticated swimming pools, the yard is starting look more like paradise than a patch of green space.

"Even though people have cottages, they still like to spend time at home," says Melissa Brown, president of Bona Vista pools. "It comes down to not having to go anywhere. Life moves so quickly now. To sit in your own backyard and do nothing is so much nicer."

Sitting on a porch overlooking a swimming pool is usually the image people have of a lazy Sunday afternoon outdoors, but as Brown suggests, that idyllic picture might also include a waterfall or a whirlpool.

"With bigger houses and smaller backyards, people aren't only looking for a swimming pool. They're looking for a work of art," she says.

Over the last three years, Brown has seen more customers wanting backyard waterfalls.

"They've become more and more popular. Designers got involved and because someone's friend has one, they want the same thing."

Whirlpool sales have also increased over the last few years. Since a lot of homeowners don't have space for a traditional pool, they're opting for something smaller.

"Whirlpools are a great substitute [for a regular pool]," says Brown. "It's great for the kids to play in. They can really soak and relax and it doesn't have to be hot all the time. Parents could have it cool during the day and only hot when they're going to be in it."

Whirlpool installations account for about 50 per cent of Bona Vista's business, but a new trend in swimming pool maintenance could become a major part of the company's business.

"Saltwater for swimming pools is becoming a huge thing," says Brown. "It has a nicer feel to the water. It also generates chlorine. The salt molecules split into sodium and chlorine, and the split allows it to chlorinate the pool."

Brown stresses that a saltwater pool isn't like swimming in the ocean.

"It's less salty than your tears."

For instance, Brown says she sold only two diving boards last year.

"Pools don't look very appealing when you have a board sticking out. The design is going more toward the stunning than the swimming."

So how much does a pool cost these days? Brown says they can run anywhere from $60,000 to $75,000, depending on the finishes, while a whirlpool costs $10,000 more than that.

"Whirlpools are more time consuming and use a lot of concrete," she says.

Having a fancy new pool is one thing, but keeping the backyard safe from slips and falls is another. That's where Rubaroc comes in.

For 27 years, Rubaroc has been installing non-slip surfaces around swimming pools, decks and driveways. Arlene Moran, vice-president of Rubaroc Ontario, compares the surface to a rubber bath mat – even if someone does fall on the surface, they're "not going to hurt themselves."

"It's a great surface for kids, the elderly, even dogs. Concrete burns people's feet, but this doesn't heat up and it doesn't cool in the fall either," she say.

Moran says most of Rubaroc's clients are homeowners who want to redo the area around their pool.

"People are moving into homes, and the one thing they want to do is do work on their backyard and work on their pool. Most of these yards have old concrete."

Moran says the biggest drawback to concrete is that it cracks, while Rubaroc's material will stay in one piece, even in frigid temperatures.

"Concrete is great – it's the cheapest solution," says Moran. "But there's no warranty, and in the first cold winter, it's going to crack. With our product, once it's down, it's staying, and that's permanently. The only way you're going to get it out is with a hammer and a chisel. "

Fixing up a backyard is only a good idea if you get to use it. And with Canada's long winters, is it even worth the trouble to have a handsome yard?

"Of course," says Moran. "Sometimes we don't see snow before October. And with heat lamps and new outdoor fireplaces or charcoal pits, you can be out there for a longer period of time."

Brown agrees.

"You can have two months of swimming here [in May and June], and then come back after July and August [at the cottage] and enjoy your yard in September and October."

Post-war modernism new trend in design

He began working in interior design in 1999 and is, like Muller, certified by ARIDO, an Ontario professional association.

Both have seen a recent trend among young homeowners towards the post-World War I modernism of the European school: Bauhaus from Germany or De Stijl in Holland.

"The young generation like a very contemporary look," says Muller.

Murphy says young clients "don't want to be like mom and dad," and plan rooms with "square lines, lean, mean, empty; one vase over there with flowers in it… not a poofy couch in the whole bunch of them."

Designers work using the client's preferences and tastes. "I'm not going to impose things," Murphy says. "If you want to have it look traditional, we'll do traditional; if you want art deco, let's do art deco."

Many clients have a sense of what they like but have trouble assembling décor and colours on their own.

"In so many homes, they've got an 18th-century table next to an art deco lamp next to a Mies van der Rohe chair," the equivalent of "black tie and tennis shoes," a look that "works for rock stars, but nobody else," Murphy says. A designer ties the pieces together to create a unified look.

Meanwhile, another trend is emerging among older clients: brighter lighting, bolder colours.

As baby boomers age, their eyes are aging as well. "When your eyes go on you," Murphy says, "the colours you used to love, the complex pale pastels – you don't even see them anymore."

To compensate, clients are choosing strong colours for their homes, clothing and accessories. "The passion of colour will make your life more exciting."

Colour can create surprises, he says – like a fire-engine red massage therapy room, despite conventional wisdom that red counteracts relaxation. Massage clients feel "like they went back to the womb. It was comforting and quiet in a different way."

Another unexpected find – red mahogany furniture, Murphy says, is even more stunning when complemented by olive green walls.

Unless you're selling your house, don't be afraid to enjoy its colours. Neutral shades, he says, may work in places like Florida with lots of sun, but anywhere the dull gray-blue of winter lasts six months of the year, "that monotone room can get very, very depressing."

Muller, who runs the business with her husband, and whose son, Ariel Muller, is a well-known Toronto designer, says accents are a great way to inject colour into a room. "Colour can make a lot of changes," in the form of picture rugs, pillows and window treatments.

Her store, Designer Treasures, on Avenue Road at Melrose, offers exclusive accessories and furniture. She also provides custom-built furniture such as shelving.

"People today take a lot of pride in their home," says Muller, who began her career in the Israeli army and has designed and furnished the Dream Home at the National Home Show and other showcase homes.

Murphy says this kind of pride is the result of yet another boomer phenomenon: the empty nest. "They can be a little more personal about their home. It's theirs now."

Choose your favourite styles and colours and let a designer help you bring it all together interior design is all about you creating the space you'll love to come home to.

All pianos tuned by Master Piano Technician Steve Jackson
We have tuned and/or serviced pianos for Ray Charles, Oscar Peterson, Eric Clapton, Anton Kuerti, and many others. It will be our pleasure to tune and service yours.

WHY BUY RESTORED PIANOS?

Having tuned and serviced thousands of pianos and repaired and rebuilt hundreds, I am well attuned to the unique qualities of vintage pianos. Just like the musicians who play them, they all look and sound a bit different.

We only restore pianos with solid foundations and follow the spirit and character of the original builders. Our vintage pianos far surpass in quality and character virtually all of the mass-production pianos sold today. — Steve Jackson

Make over your garden in 20 minutes

(NC) — Gardeners can now enjoy a little instant gratification with colour enhanced Nature Scapes mulch, made from 100 per cent natural forest products, new from Scotts

"You can achieve stunning season-long colour with Nature Scapes mulch in about 20 minutes," says Tracy Muxlow, Manager for Scotts' garden products in Canada. "The rich colour and high quality will help keep the landscape beautiful all season thanks to its advanced 'ColourGuard' formula," she says. "Mulch also helps prevent weeds and keep soil moist, dramatically reducing the time homeowners need to spend weeding and watering."

NatureScapes is made from natural forest products that include cedar, pine, hemlock and spruce. While other mulches may contain recycled waste wood products that can contain harmful chemicals and steal valuable nitrogen from plants, NatureScapes is made from all natural sources that degrade into beneficial organic matter that enriches the soil

NatureScapes Mulch is available exclusively at The Home Depot in 2006 in two colours: Sierra Red and Classic Black

Décor trends: Home is where the comfort is

(NC) — Like a well-feathered nest your home is all about comfort. More and more decorators are taking their inspiration from the growing trend towards comfort and warmth. People are looking to insulate themselves from the bustle of the outside world by creating a soothing, enveloping and pampering mood at home.

One way to create this mood is through the use of colour. Taking a cue from this growing trend, Sico Paints has put together a palette of classic colours called the Comfort series that evoke the warmth of nature's elements.

The palette features neutrals such as Portobello (6185-41), beiges such as Linden Wood (6192-42) and soft greens like Arctic Lichen (6143-42) that always have a place, reflecting a trend established for years.

"The beauty of beiges is their neutrality, their undeniable elegance," explains Dominique Pépin, Senior Brand Manager at Sico Paints and a member of the Color Marketing Group. "All on their own, they create a welcome sensation of calm and comfort to any space." She adds that the new beiges are neither cliché nor old school. Rather they're all grown up and considered to be quite contemporary and very sophisticated.

Decorator tips for this colour series:

Pépin says you can create the blissful atmosphere of a boutique hotel in your home by playing rich, neutral tones one against the other. "The carefully controlled use of neutral colours in several shades (in a single space) is synonymous with sophisticated elegance," she adds. For more information on the latest colour trends visit sico.ca.

New townhomes built with special features

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Increasingly, townhomes are becoming a popular residential choice for many people. From young couples looking for an affordable property with modern accoutrements to singles to those looking to downsize, people are finding that this style of home suits their particular needs.

At the northeast corner of Dufferin Street and Summeridge Drive, not far from highways 7 and 407, a cozy community of townhomes is in the works.

Located in Thornhill Woods, the new Baker's Lane development will feature 32 townhomes constructed by Elm Developments.

"Townhomes offer a more efficient use of space and appeal to a more compact lifestyle," says Barbara Allen, a partner at Arfin, Allen & Associates, which is marketing and advertising the development. "It gives buyers other options in terms of lifestyle."

Location is the name of the game in real estate and Allen points out that the townhomes will be situated in one of the fastest growing Jewish communities in North America with numerous amenities nearby.

"There's a shopping mall right across the street, it's near Dufferin Street so you have public transit and there is a protected wooded area, so the views are beautiful," Allen says.

The homes will be constructed with a brick and stone exterior and will be in the 2,000-square-foot range with three or four bedrooms, depending on the model.

"Kitchens are probably the key room in the home for most people," says Allen, noting a special bonus for early buyers will include granite kitchen countertops, pre-finished strip hardwood floors and three stainless steel appliances.

"We also have things like islands with breakfast bars and a desk in the kitchen, which is very useful for organizing bills, coupons and all the details that go into running a home."

Some trends in townhomes today, Allen says, are master bedrooms with walk-in closets, and ensuites that have two sinks as well as a separate shower stall and bathtub. Models in the new development will offer all of these features.

The townhomes in Baker's Lane will also have main floor powder rooms, nine-foot main floor ceilings, and private studies and computer lofts in certain models.

With so many townhomes being built these days, finding the best fit for you and your family can be a challenge.

Allen's advice is to focus on who the builder is and, of course, location.

"You want to make sure both that the product fits your lifestyle and that this is the neighbourhood you're going to enjoy," she advises.

"As for the home itself, you obviously want to make sure the builder is reliable and... that the builder cares about details."

To that end, Allen notes Baker's Lane is being spearheaded by a builder with a background in custom home construction and a long history of quality workmanship.

Finally, Allen trumpets the neighbourly aura Baker's Lane is trying to foster.

"It's nice when you have that sense of intimacy which lets you get to know your neighbours well," she says.

Construction is slated to begin later this year and occupancy is expected mid-way through 2007.

For more information about Baker's Lane, phone 905-709-0884 or visit www.bakers-lane.com.

Proper lighting transforms a home from drab to fab

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Lighting is one of the key pieces of the interior décor puzzle. Without proper lighting, your home can look flat and uninviting, and be missing the warmth you know it is full of. At the flip of a switch, your home can be transformed into a pleasant and comfortable living space.

To help you in the search for just the right lighting for your home, start with these two fabulous showrooms, which are full of every type of lighting imaginable.

Universal Lamp (416-787-8900, www.greatlighting.com) offers an extensive selection of lighting. From lamps and chandeliers to recessed lighting, Universal specializes in high-end and beautiful lighting. For 49 years, Universal has been supplying Toronto with superior lighting at affordable prices.

Dimmer switches help manipulate room's ambience

Offering quality custom work as well, Universal will alter or repair pieces, so that they are customized to your needs. Universal's experienced consultants will work with your floor plans to achieve the best lighting scheme for your home. To further customize your look, simply adding a dimmer helps you manipulate the ambience of any room at a mere touch.

Universal offers today's most advanced lighting. It can easily be integrated into a modern, contemporary or traditional home.

And if your existing lighting needs a bit of a renewal, then look no further than Custom Lampshade Inc. (416-236-3244, www.customlampshade.com). As its name suggests, Custom Lampshade Inc (CLI) will completely customize lampshades to fit your living environment. Since 1982, the friendly craftspeople there have been working to restore cherished antique lamps as well as designing new ones. When your older lampshades have given out, CLI can replicate them. Whether the shades are bell or pear shaped, the craftspeople can match any vintage style. CLI works with interior designers and antique dealers, too.

CLI features more than 300 handmade lampshades in its showroom. With the help of an experienced member of CLI's staff, you pick the shape, fabric, colour and design of your lampshade. For CLI's "perfect fitting" service, be sure to bring your lamps in for exact measurements. With the exact measurements, a new lampshade can be created to fit your lamp.

CLI's custom work comes with the guarantee of superb craftsmanship. "All of our work is hand stitched and decorated", says CLI's André Sermer. "People really appreciate good quality work and we promise that."

With just the right lighting, the ambience of your home can be transformed from drab to fab. With summer quickly approaching, it's the perfect time to warm the inside of your home. The experienced staff at Universal Lamp and Custom Lamp Shade will make it seem as simple as flicking a switch!

Spruce up your home with new flooring

Laminates are another alternative

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Spring has sprung, and like the grass outside, your floors might be ready for a renewal. If you want a change of scenery and are not quite sure which direction to take, there are two fantastic places to start with in Toronto.

Riviera Flooring, at 8111 Jane St., Unit #6, in Concord, has been offering the best quality and selection in flooring at "down and dirty prices" for more than 25 years. Complete with a wide array of hardwood, laminate and carpet choices, the combination showroom and warehouse acts as a one-stop shop for beautiful flooring.

Offering one-on-one consultation and planning, Riviera's founder and owner Joe Rivietz is committed to finding the perfect flooring for his clients. Consultations are by appointment only, and Rivietz urges you to try it. Phone 905-738-4588.

"I will take care of you personally," he guarantees.

With the low-key and no-pressure environment in the showroom, he promises that you will feel comfortable to make the perfect choice for your home.

To avoid the headaches that accompany removing nailed or glued flooring and to help with the maintenance of your flooring, Riviera specializes in "glueless engineered" woods.

In addition to offering superior quality flooring, the company offers a complete service with full installation. Riviera's highly professional installers have more than 50 combined years of carpet and hardwood servicing.

"We'll lift and dispose of existing floors and fully install the new one," says Rivietz. In addition, all staff are bonded and service is guaranteed.

The quality of the flooring offered by Riviera is equalled only by its superb, friendly and personalized service and its unbeatable prices.

With 12 showroom locations across Ontario, Giant Carpet (www.giantcarpet.com) is another premier source of flooring. But don't be misled by its name. Giant Carpet offers every kind of flooring from ceramic tiles to beautiful, decorative stones and metallic designs. As well, the stores carry thousands of designer area rugs and carpets from trusted names like Stainmaster and Beaulieu.

Operating for over 40 years, Giant Carpet's showrooms are not only full of flooring selections, they are also extremely beautiful.

"Our customers are always wowed by our showrooms," says Claudia Wetzel, the company's representative.

Furthermore, she adds, the many choices are made accessible by Giant Carpet's financing program, which includes interest-free options. The extremely flexible system is designed to let you enjoy your flooring choice, no matter how luxurious it may be.

Giant Carpet also guarantees installation within seven days of purchase. The experienced installers will even move existing furniture and clean up after the installation!

Wetzel cites exotic hardwood as the biggest trend in modern flooring. Whether you have a traditional or a modern design, hardwood has become a mainstay in today's home. It is easily integrated into any décor because it can be covered with area rugs or left bare.

Giant Carpet offers unrivalled service, selection and value. "We always keep our promises and we'll always deliver," Wetzel says. With its wide selection of quality ceramic, vinyl, hardwood and carpet, you can be sure that your beautiful floors will last for many years to come.

If your floors are looking tired and the time has come for renovation, look no further than Riviera or Giant Carpet. Offering superb quality flooring at extremely affordable prices, the extensive selection available from both will ensure that you make the best decision for sprucing up your home.

Companies help you garden naturally

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Perfectly pristine plants and lush lawns certainly look nice, but the synthetic products people often use to spruce them up aren't likely to do wonders for the environment.

That's why going the natural, organic route is becoming more and more common.

"We specialize in organic lawn care and gardening, which means we don't use any synthetic fertilizers, herbicides or chemical insecticides," says Mitch Levine, owner of Bio-Lawn.

"By adding organic matter to the soil, we're enriching the soil, which in turn will provide you with healthy plants. That's the main difference between organic and synthetic."

[Photos courtesy of Florabundance]

And just as growing plants the natural way is healthy, placing them in urns or containers made from natural materials is both aesthetically pleasing and organically textured.

"The majority of the plant containers I make have living material in them," says Elizabeth Zmijak, owner of Florabundance, which specializes in customized plant holding baskets and floral designs.

"For instance, I use a lot of pine, twigs and different types of dried foliage."

To nourish greenery in a healthy way, Levine encourages the application of such natural materials as poultry manure, alfalfa and kelp.

"If you're a naturalist who is interested in gardening, try to put native plants in your garden that are from your part of Ontario" says Levine, who has owned Bio-Lawn since 1989.

"That way, the plants won't require extra nutrients or extra care."

Levine adds that the best thing for soil health is to incorporate good composts into your garden.

Zmijak emphasizes that floral designs beautify a home or backyard in every season.

"It becomes a beautiful focal point that celebrates the changing of the season," she says.

"For instance, in spring, I just started doing different arrangements of spring flowers, such as daffodils, tulips and crocuses... In autumn, I'll change to a seasonal arrangement that has different colours and a lot of living plant material, like tiny pumpkins and grasses."

When purchasing an urn, Zmijak advises clients to ensure that it fits the style and size of their home.

She adds that one of the most critical elements to plant maintenance is watering.

"I recommend that if people aren't around to water, then they should have an automatic watering system," she says.

Levine points out that organic gardens aren't as squeaky clean as synthetically maintained ones, but people are becoming increasingly aware of the dangers of pesticides, which is leading them in a more natural direction.

When seeking out a quality organic gardening and lawn care provider, he encourages clients to look for a professional company with solid background in the field.

"Do you want a student who is just spreading fertilizer, or do you want an educated technician who actually knows what they're doing and understands the fundamentals of gardening and lawn care?" he asks.

"And when you call the company, you need someone to answer your questions who knows what they're talking about."

In terms of customer service, Zmijak welcomes her clients to take an active role in the design process.

"You want to know you're getting your money's worth, so good communication with the designer is vital, especially in terms of things you like and dislike," she says.

Find out more about Bio-Lawn at www.bio-lawn.com or by calling 905-881-7942.

Exercising at home an alternative to gym membership

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Not everyone wants to buy a gym membership. It's costly and there's always a chance it'll never be used. Mitch Melnick, manager of Fitness Source says more and more people are frustrated by the gym experience, so they're working out at home.

"To join a health club today is extremely expensive. A lot of families are coming in here. Instead of spending $4,000 to $5,000 a year on memberships, they're buying a large universal type of gym, weights and bicycles."

Figuring out what equipment to buy for a home gym can be overwhelming too, but Melnick says Fitness Source staff will help exercise buffs design an exercise room that suits their needs.

"We have a very well-trained staff who give excellent advice," says Melnick. "It's not a high-pressured environment – we're not a commission-oriented retail chain. We're very passionate and committed to help our clients. That's what we're known for."

Melnick says a lot of clients still buy the traditional treadmill, but the elliptical – a multi-purpose cardio machine – is one of Fitness Sources' best sellers.

"Elliptical trainers have become very popular for two reasons. It's a piece of equipment that's very popular in a health club or a commercial environment, and it does a lot of exercises all at once," says Melnick. "It has very little impact if people have problems with knees or backs and it doesn't take a lot of co-ordination."

New exercisers don't have to start their workout regiment on a treadmill or an elliptical, though. Fitness Source also sells a lot of weight-based equipment.

"For people who are looking to get into strength training… we have a universal gym that takes up less than 5½ feet of space. It has the ability to do over 40 different exercises. This is a popular item people want. And once people's workouts get more advanced, a lot of the systems we have do have additional leg- press options, and [we have] additional features to add to what they already have."

Compared to a gym membership, buying a weight machine is cheap. A basic universal gym runs for about $800. Other types of exercising, such as Pilates and yoga, are even more affordable.

"Someone can get a mat and DVD and a ball for under $60," says Melnick. "Fitness Source really prides itself on being cutting edge. We've always carried items that we felt were very important, like yoga mats, yoga blocks, and videos. By having an instructor on DVD for an hour, it's fantastic."

He adds that more people are buying yoga equipment than ever before.

"Sales have increased many fold because now it's become more mainstream."

In general, business couldn't be better for Fitness Source, and Melnick says the media can be thanked for that.

"The message of exercising has gotten out thanks to a constant barrage of media. Things like, how important exercising is not just physically but mentally, decreasing body fat, lowering cholesterol. With bad eating habits, it's become evident that exercise has unlimited benefits.

"Also, the old adage was; you have to go to a health club and be in an environment with large expensive machines, but you don't necessarily need that. You can do it in the privacy of your own home."

With so many different types of home exercise equipment, Melnick predicts the workout craze will only become more frenzied.

"We haven't even scratched the surface," he says. "Exercising is about health and wellness, not just dumbbells, barbells and treadmills. We carry over 2,000 items in our stores. There are endless items for medicine-ball training, using a trampoline at home, to agility training. These things have become mainstream. They're not something you just find in university training centres."

Fitness Source, which is owned by the Forzani Group, has nine stores in Ontario. The company plans to open stores in the rest of Canada in the near future.

"We think there's unlimited growth," says Melnick. "We have a very unique mix of product, and wonderful educated staff. Fitness Source has both big and small items that will allow us to really grow. We haven't seen anyone in Canada with that mix."

Would you buy a BBQ from a paint salesperson?

Absolutely no disrespect to paint salespeople ... when we need paint, that's who we go to. And so should you. But if you don't order Chinese food in a deli, why purchase a BBQ from a hardware store?

If you do buy a barbecue from a big-box or hardware store that sells paint, lumber, or screws — and you're not a Certified Barbecue Expert — you may find that a single factual omission (however unintentional) or unanswered question can turn a great "deal" into an expensive mistake.

At Sobie's, we don't sell paint. We don't sell lumber, nor do we sell furniture. We sell BARBECUES, and we make it our business to know them upside down, inside and out.

As Toronto's foremost barbecue specialty store and as Certified Barbecue Experts, we have the selection, knowledge and expertise to help you make the right decision when it comes to buying a BBQ.

Our prices are competitive. On rare occasions, a big-box store with BBQs on sale might "SAVE" you a few bucks. But if they can't answer ALL your questions to your satisfaction, then maybe what they're really selling you is the "wrong BBQ at the right price."

When you buy a BBQ from us, you have the comfort of knowing that you have purchased the right grill for your lifestyle, culinary requirements, and budget. From portable units to high-end stainless steel Infra-Red BBQs, we have one that will meet your needs to a T.

We also carry parts for most makes & models, as well as all the BBQ tools and accessories you'll ever need...including natural maple hardwood charcoal, not the fabricated blue kind held together with glue. (Do you really want those binders going into your food?)

We look forward to making your grilling experience a happy and healthy one, every step of the way.

Tired tub? Consider refinishing or replacing it

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

A bathtub will take quite a lot of wear and tear over years of showering and bathing, and eventually it may be time to renovate.

That's why bathtub refinishing and replacements are fast becoming popular.

People want their tubs to look brand new or to spruce up the features in the tub, such as having a Jacuzzi or air jets installed.

While aesthetics are a primary appeal for a newly lined tub, professionals note that safety is a major factor, too.

Shiff adds that many customers also seek to have rusted-out drains replaced or have the old-style cast-iron tubs refinished with more modern acrylic material.

Lampert Plumbing president Lawrence Lampert says bathtub refinishing generally involves putting in a new shower base, covering the walls and then refinishing the old tub.

"We have 900 moulds that we make sure are a custom fit," he says, adding a trained technician can do the job by himself or herself.

"There's a large selection of colours and styles to cover up the walls."

If you're looking for long-term practical use, Shiff advises customers to consider having the tub replaced.

"If you're going to do tile replacement, then I would suggest replacing the bathtub itself," he offers.

"By removing the tiles, you'd make it easier to pull out the bathtub and put in a brand new one."

In fact, depending on the size of the bathroom, the worker may be able to expand the size of your tub, from the traditional five feet, up to six feet.

When shopping around for the right company to do the job, both Lampert and Shiff advise seeking out a service provider with a longstanding reputation.

"You want a company that has been in business a long time," says Lampert, adding that his company has been operating for 75 years.

Shiff says you should talk to friends of family members for companies they've been happy with and then call these providers yourself.

"The best thing to do is get independent references," he says.

"Call the people who did the work and try to get a feel for who they are and what their approach is."

Shiff has another valuable piece of advice.

"Give a deposit to show you're interested, but don't pay everything until you're satisfied and the job is all done."

Brother pleads for Syria to release remains of Eli Cohen

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For years after her son was hung in a public square in Damascus, Sofie Cohen was inconsolable.

"Every time she heard a car accident, she tried to remember her son and she cried day and night," recalled Maurice, one of Sofie's eight children. "She was very, very delicate."

When his mother took ill for the last time at age 87 in 1994, she implored Maurice while on her deathbed to make a pledge. "She asked me to make all my efforts to bring my brother to be buried according to Jewish law in Israel," he recounted. "Unfortunately, I couldn't keep my promise. I have not succeeded."

Despite his best efforts, as well as the intervention of the government of Israel and back-channel appeals to the most senior Syrian leadership, the remains of Eli Cohen remain at an unknown location in Syria.

Cohen, who was hanged on May 18, 1965, on live TV, has come to be known as one of Israel's greatest spies – perhaps the greatest. From 1962 until his death at age 41, he insinuated himself into the top levels of Syrian society. Using the cover of a wealthy merchant of Syrian descent, Cohen befriended the then president of Syria, Amin el Hafiz, and at his death was being considered a candidate for deputy minister of defence.

International petition launched

The intelligence he transferred to Israel, particularly about Syrian military strong points in the Golan Heights, is considered crucial to Israel's capture of the area in the 1967 Six Day War.

Cohen's younger brother, Maurice, who like Eli worked for the Mossad, Israel's intelligence service, believes it is past time for the Syrian government to put politics aside and make a humanitarian gesture by returning his remains.

"Syria wants to discuss the matter in connection with the Golan Heights or other political affairs. This has nothing to do with politics it is humanitarian," Maurice said in a telephone interview from Israel. "All religions recognize proper burial. [Eli] already received his punishment. They have to return [his body] with no alternatives. It is against humanitarian law. They are making a big mistake in keeping his family suffering."

When he was executed, Eli left behind a wife, two daughters and a son who was 40 days old at the time.

Eli's life was rarely quiet. He and his siblings – five boys and two girls were born in Alexandria, Egypt, of parents who moved separately at young ages from their ancestral home in Aleppo, Syria.

Historic $50 million donation to UJA

Less than a month after Canada's finance minister James Flaherty encouraged donations to Canadian charities by eliminating the capital gains tax on gifts of public securities, prominent Toronto businessman Larry Tanenbaum and his wife Judy have donated one of the largest gifts in Canadian history to a community foundation.

The recipient of the $50 million Larry & Judy Tanenbaum Family Endowment Fund – provided through stock donations – is the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, the endowment arm of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the city's main Jewish community organization and North America's third-largest North American Jewish federation in terms of annual dollars raised.

With the Larry & Judy Tanenbaum Family Endowment Fund, Jewish Foundation assets are now closing in on $200 million, reinforcing the Jewish Foundation's ranking as one of Canada's top community foundations.

Larry Tanenbaum

Tanenbaum is chair and CEO of Kilmer Van Nostrand, a private investment holding company with diversified interests in construction, infrastructure, electronics, technology, sports and entertainment. He is also chairman of the board of Maple Leaf Sports & Entertainment Ltd., owner of the Toronto Maple Leafs, the Toronto Raptors and the Air Canada Centre. Tanenbaum has a long record of service to non-profit organizations, including the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, the Miller Thomson Foundation, Mount Sinai Hospital, Baycrest and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"Judy and I are honoured to be able to help meet important community needs with this endowment, and we hope that others will step forward in the same way," said Tanenbaum.

"The Larry & Judy Tanenbaum Family Endowment Fund continues an acclaimed tradition of tzedakah, transmitted by Larry's parents, Max and Anne, for which the family is well known and well respected," said David Engel, UJA Federation's chairman of the board.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Event Supports Israel

TORONTO — More than 2,000 Christians and Jews came together May 18 for one of the largest-ever events in Canada to support Israel. Sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada and the Institute for Canadian Values, the event, called "A Night to Honour Israel" and held at Canada Christian College in Toronto, featured a keynote address by Pastor John Hagee, a televangelist from San Antonio, Tex., as well as speeches by Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, retired Israeli general Doron Almog, B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant, and Charles McVety, president of Canada Christian College.

WORLD

Tunisian Lag b'Omer

DJERBA, Tunisia — Thousands of people attended the annual Lag B'Omer pilgrimage to the Tunisian island of Djerba. The two-day celebration at the Ghriba Synagogue marks the end of a legendary plague 2,000 years ago. The synagogue was the site of a 2002 Al Qaeda terror attack that killed 21 people, mostly German tourists. The shul is the oldest synagogue in Africa and serves one of the world's oldest Jewish communities.

Chomsky Terror Tour?

BEIRUT — U.S. professor Noam Chomsky met with Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah in Beirut last week, Al-Manar TV, the terror group's station, reported. "Hezbollah's insistence on keeping arms is justified," Al-Manar quoted Chomsky, a critic of U.S. and Israeli foreign policy, as saying. Chomsky added: "Nasrallah has a reasoned argument" that the group should be armed "as a deterrent to potential aggression." He also called the United States the leading terrorist state, Al-Manar reported. Chomsky also spoke at the American University of Beirut.

Station Aired Hate

CAPE TOWN — A South African broadcasting committee ruled that a Muslim radio station aired hate speech. The Broadcasting Monitoring and Complaints Committee of South Africa ruled recently in favour of the complaint made by the South African Jewish Board of Deputies against a Cape Town Muslim radio station, Radio 786. The dispute began after a May 1998 broadcast in which Yakub Zaki, a historian at the Muslim Institute in London, said only one million-plus Jews were killed in World War II, and none in gas chambers. There will be a hearing later this month to set a penalty for the station.

Cemetery Desecrated

MILAN — Police are investigating the desecration of a Jewish cemetery in Milan. Vandals toppled or otherwise damaged about 40 graves. Cemetery workers discovered the attack May 16. No one claimed responsibility, and no anti-Semitic graffiti was found at the scene.

Shoah Denied

MONTGOMERY, Ala. — A candidate for Alabama attorney general has denied the Holocaust. Larry Darby, a Democrat, said May 12 that only 140,000 Jews died in the Shoah and the six-million figure is propagated by the "Holocaust industry," Associated Press reported. Darby also spoke May 14 at a white supremacist meeting in New Jersey. Party chairman Joe Turnham said the Alabama Democrats are investigating Darby, who's running in the June 6 primary. Turnham said hate "is completely unacceptable" in his party.

Poet Laureate Dies

NEW YORK — Stanley Kunitz, a former U.S. poet laureate who made metaphoric use of the Talmud and other Jewish images in his poetry, died May 14 at age 100. Kunitz, who was known for writing on themes ranging from life and death to gardens, won the Pulitzer Prize in 1959.

Goering's Relative Might Become Jewish

ZURICH — A distant relative of Nazi Luftwaffe Chief Hermann Goering is on his way to becoming Jewish, according to a report in Germany's Spiegel Online magazine.

Matthias Goering, 49, lives in Zurich and has begun observing some of the practices of Orthodox Judaism, including wearing a kippah and keeping kosher.

Goering, whose great-grandfather's brother was Hermann Goering's grandfather's brother, said he had lost his job and his family when two events moved him to consider conversion: first, his prayer for a new job was answered, and second, he dreamed God told him he was needed "to guard the gates of Jerusalem."

Goering told the news magazine that he was subjected to taunting as a child because of his family name, but that his sense of responsibility for remembering the Holocaust was the same as that of any German.

"There is a spiritual guilt in our family, guilt in the German nation, and it is our responsibility to declare it openly," he said. "I think God is taking this opportunity to use my name to change something in the hearts of others."

Gay Nuptials Row

MOSCOW —The leading Russian Jewish organization is called on the community to boycott Reform Jews after a Reform rabbi officiated at what is believed to be the country's first Jewish same-sex commitment ceremony. "We are calling on Jewish organizations and communities of Russia to relinquish any religious contacts with the people who have committed this sacrilegious and provocative act," the Chabad-led Federation of Jewish Communities of Russia, the largest Jewish group in the country, said in a statement. The ceremony for a Moscow lesbian couple took place April 2, but was only publicized last week by a Moscow newspaper. Rabbi Nelly Shulman, who officiated, said she did so on her own private initiative and wasn't backed by the umbrella organization of Reform Judaism in Russia.

Anti-Semitic Acts Rise

BERLIN — Anti-Semitic crimes in Germany rose by 25 per cent in 2005 over the previous year, according to government statistics. The total number of crimes was 1,682, translating into five reported incidents per day, the Ministry of the Interior reported.

JNF, Manitoba sign deal to aid province, Israel

$1 million partnership to focus on improving environment in both regions

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Province of Manitoba and the Jewish National Fund (JNF) of Canada, Prairie region, have signed a partnership agreement to promote technology and research intended to assist communities in both northern Manitoba and Israel.

The three-year, $1-million environmental research partnership will focus on improving the environment in both regions through forest diversification, water innovation and rapid-growth greenhouse technology.

Last year, the JNF signed a similar deal with the province of Alberta that emphasized dry-land agriculture in drought-stricken areas of southern Alberta.

The agreement with Manitoba originated in a meeting late last year between JNF Canada national shaliach Rami Kleinmann and Emoke Szathmary, president of the University of Manitoba.

"We discussed the idea of a co-operative agreement between the university and the JNF," Kleinmann said. "More than 40 researchers at the University of Manitoba are interested in participating on joint research projects with Israel on environmental issues.

"I thought that the government would be interesting as well," he added. "The deputy premier [Rosann Wowchuk, who is also the minister of agriculture], in particular, has shown a lot of interest."

Manitoba Premier Gary Doer has committed $1 million to the project through the province's Agri-food Research and Development Initiative, which funds agricultural innovation and development in Manitoba.

The funds will be contributed over a three-year period, with JNF fundraising contributing an equal amount. This will establish an endowment with the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba to enable joint research and collaboration between Manitoba and Israel well into the future.

One of the projects will be to help develop a greenhouse vegetable program in isolated northern aboriginal communities and will include flying people from selected communities to Israel for training in growing greenhouse vegetables.

"The high cost of commercial food in remote communities is a significant obstacle to good nutrition," Wowchuk said in a statement. "This research can help support those communities looking to promote traditional harvesting, gardening and food self-sufficiency."

Kleinmann said JNF research coordinator Avi Gafni plans to visit aboriginal communities in July to gain first-hand information about soil, water, climate and other conditions. He has also been in discussions with experts about temperature and other conditions in the North.

Emoke Szathmary

"Manitoba's extreme cold and Israel's extremely hot temperatures present similar agricultural challenges," said JNF Prairie region president Graham Dixon. "Water is a precious resource for both Manitoba and Israel. This partnership will establish links to share information, expertise, and best practices related to the environment."

Young idealists in the Negev

Part 2 of the highlights from the International Conference of Jewish Newspaper Editors, held May 7 to 11, in Israel

Some 40 kilometres south of Be'er Sheva in the sand and sage of the Negev Desert is the small community of Ashalim, an unpretentious village of modest, single family dwellings, some of which show the weathered markings of the hard desert climate.

But our bus did not stop in Ashalim. For it was the even smaller, more modest community of Kfar Adiel immediately adjacent that was our destination.

Kfar Adiel is a student village – built by students, housing students – that pulses with purpose and the unstoppable energy of young idealists who believe deeply that goodness can change the world.

Adiel is two years old. Seventy students live there; 20 students founded it; 50 joined last year. The community's first baby was born there three days before we visited.

It is the creation of the Ayalim Association, a non-profit foundation established in September 2002 by young veterans of the Israel Defence Forces. This handful of social entrepreneurs were determined to find a way to combine their driving personal needs to undertake socially worthwhile causes with the national need for building the country.

Thus, they used the funds they received from the army upon discharge to create Ayalim.

Ayalim, in turn, distributes scholarships and housing stipends to university students who wish to combine studies with a very specific form of social action: building the Negev and the Galilee. The demands of the Ayalim program upon the youthful participants are essentially twofold: to study at Ben-Gurion University (BGU) in Be'er Sheva and to give of themselves to the people and to place in which they live. And the foundation has been flooded with applications.

At present, 260 students are participating in Ayalim's visionary work. They were selected from more than 5,000 post-army graduates who applied. The number is indicative of the rich vein of idealism that courses deeply through an often-maligned generation.

In addition to studying at BGU, each of the student residents of Adiel does 10 hours per week of volunteer work with "at risk" children in nearby communities. And the students build their own homes as well. Actually, they adapt 30-year-old trailers, called "caravans" in Israel, to be their dwellings. This entails learning about all the trades involved in home-building, such as plastering, bricklaying, electrical, plumbing, gardening, etc.

Indeed, when he planted the first tree in Adiel two years ago, former prime minister Ariel Sharon commented on the students' home-building. "The members of the association come not only to establish a new village, but also to create a new ideological climate," Sharon said. "They work in the development towns and environs, contribute to the advancement of education in the region and thus lay the foundations for the blossoming of the people of the Negev. I was also pleased to hear that they insisted on building their houses with their own hands while they were on vacation from the university. This, too, proves something about their characters."

Those remarkable characters were very much evident when the busload of some 27 foreign editors visited them two weeks ago. Inbar Seidman, the community's engaging manager, was our guide when we dropped in. She pointed proudly to the homes, the trees, the shrubs, the pathways, and even to the pets that she and her youthful colleagues have rooted into the beckoning soil of the Negev. "I really believe in what we are doing. We are students, sure, but we are also something extra," Inbar told us.

Yuval Moses, 23, from Jerusalem, jumped at the chance to enrol in the Ayalim challenge. For his volunteer work, he teaches dance to girls in Dimona. "It's hard work, but I love it. It is less about the dancing and more about the connection with the kids."

The enthusiastic young people at Adiel are breathing life into David Ben-Gurion's vision and hope for the Negev. The desert comprises some 60 per cent of the land of Israel, but less than 10 per cent of its people live there. The Ayalim-Adiel initiative, and others to follow, will bring more people to the Negev.

A member of a local municipal council said of the Adiel residents: "These youngsters are new Israeli pioneers. Youth is their power. They don't wait for tomorrow. They build today.

He added: "If more people of education, of ideals, of determination come to the area, the Negev will awaken."

Plans are underway for more villages, near Dimona and near Netivot. Resources and experts from the Jewish Agency for Israel – and thus the united Jewish communities of North America and the Jewish National Fund assist Ayalim. The program has become so popular that it's being adapted and expanded somewhat for BGU students from overseas.

But the real kudos must go to the young men and women who, virtually with one voice, told us: "The country was proclaimed in 1948," one of the students said, "but we still have to build it. We can't change the whole world, but we can change part of it."

Students urged to help end Darfur genocide

By JENNA ROSMAN
CJN Intern

High school students attending the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto's annual seminar day on the Holocaust earlier this month were urged to make 'Never again' a reality by working to end the genocide taking place in Darfur.

"The challenge to you, ladies and gentleman, is to change that pattern [of condoning crimes against humanity]. The challenge to you is to say enough is enough," Norman Epstein, co-chair of Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan (CASTS), told 700 students from across the province at the May 10 event, held at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

Norman Epstein

Since the Holocaust ended 61 years ago, Epstein said, genocides have occurred in Cambodia, Rwanda, and Bosnia, but the genocide in the Darfur of Sudan is the first one this century.

"'Never again' cannot mean empty words in bold writing," Epstein said.

For the past three years, the Sudanese government has supported the Janjaweed, an Arab militia that has killed more than 300,000 civilians in Darfur.

"[Canada] can take more international leadership, and we have to call upon the African Union, the European Union and the United Nations to do more," he said. "If not now, then when? If not in Sudan, then where? If not by determination, then how? And if we cannot as humanity then there's only one question left: Why not?"

Speaking emphatically, Epstein urged the young audience to voice their opinions to their local MP's.

"We are Canadians and we have to make sure our Canadian leaders take leadership," he said. "[Prime Minister] Steven Harper said, 'Canada can no longer lead from the bleachers.' Let's take him up on the challenge. Let's see if he has the interest, the intention to have that kind of moral authority."

Epstein said the United Nations has been careful not to call the situation in Darfur a genocide because, "if you use the 'G' word, you have to intervene. The United Nations has always been careful not to use the 'G' word."

Epstein brought up the Responsibility To Protect, a document created by Canada and endorsed by the UN, which he said maintains "that if a country is slaughtering its people, then the international community must intervene."

In an interview after his talk, Epstein said he wanted to inspire the students from the 22 high schools to "stand up and say, 'I don't know what the older generations have done, but I'm not going to be oblivious to what's happening in other parts of the world. We live in a global village, and genocide is an unacceptable crime against humanity.'"

Epstein said the Sudanese economy is supported by oil, which is sold to countries such as China, Malaysia and India.

"That's where [the government is] financing its war against its citizens," he said. "China has access to the oil there. ... it probably gets it at a better price than it would in another market."

Epstein said it's important for people to decide whether "strategic commercial interests trump humanitarian interests," adding that Russia has sold old, Soviet-era equipment to Sudan.

"We have to ask these kids, is [business] more important than the hundreds and thousands of people who are being slaughtered by the government who you are doing business with?"

Russia and China hold two of the five permanent seats on the UN Security Council, and he said they are "obstructing intervention" because of their relations with the Sudanese government.

Epstein said that if the world doesn't put an end to the crisis in Darfur, "the genocide will end only because there will be no more Africans to kill." He added that violence is starting to spread to neighbouring countries such as Chad, causing more regional instability.

A multinational peacekeeping force is the only way to end the massacres, he argued.

"We have no choice. We have to make it our focus in the international community, that these crimes against humanity cannot go on with impunity," he said. "Sooner or later the international community has to do the right thing."

Epstein said it's important for the Jewish community to speak out.

"We can't complain as Jews [and ask], 'Where was the international community [during the Holocaust]?' unless we're willing to stand up to a modern-day genocide," he said. "Then we have learned no lesson."

He said tikkun olam, repairing and healing the world, is a fundamental Jewish value.

"I think every Jew should make it part of their reason for being," he said. "We know we live in an imperfect world, and we have to try everything within our power to try to correct that... If we can't protect people from genocide, we have to question our measure of humanity."

CASTS is supported by 19 organizations and has some 1,500 people on its e-mail list. Its website is www.geocities.com/castsudan.

Nobel laureate urges Jews to fight fanaticism

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Elie Wiesel – professor, writer, Nobel Laureate, humanitarian and Holocaust survivor – has always done everything in his power to inform the world about the atrocities suffered by the Jewish people during World War II.

Through the Elie Wiesel Foundation for Humanity, he educates people about the Holocaust, with the purpose of combating indifference, intolerance and injustice, while promoting acceptance, understanding and equality.

Wiesel was in town this week at the invitation of Hillel of Greater Toronto to present a lecture to a sold-out crowd at the University of Toronto. It was titled "Confronting Fanaticism: Building Moral Unity in a Diverse Society."

In a telephone interview with the CJN last Thursday, Wiesel, 77, discussed the importance of speaking out on behalf of people who may not have a voice – regardless of whether they are Jewish – because he knows first-hand what can happen when the world chooses to ignore human suffering.

"I believe it is a priority for a Jew to help Jews, but not exclusively," said Wiesel, whose family was murdered in Nazi death camps.

"I'm a teacher and I am a writer, and as a teacher and a writer, what I try to do is sensitize my readers or my students, to make them more sensitive, first of all, to our people, to our people's pain, to our people's memory, to our people's joy, to our people's fear, and to be sensitive and to go beyond it," he said.

"Be sensitive to other communities if they are in danger and if they feel oppressed and they feel they are neglected or humiliated."

Wiesel is world-renowned for speaking about the horrors of the Holocaust and for having written Night, a memoir of his experience in Auschwitz and the most famous and celebrated book of the nearly 40 he has written. But he has also made it a priority to speak out against the dangers of fanaticism and the current genocide in the Darfur region of Sudan.

"I'll be speaking about fanaticism and about how to fight it, how to disarm it, how to unmask it," he said, referring to his lecture at U of T.

"A fanatic is someone who believes that only he or she has the key to truth and only he or she possesses the exclusivity of truth.

"It is somebody who has all the certainty in the world and no doubts, and a fanatic believes he is superior to anyone who is not like he is," Wiesel said.

"If a fanatic is given power then he becomes dangerous and if you give it nuclear power, as is now the case with Iran, we surely are in trouble," said Wiesel, who is a strong supporter of Israel.

But Wiesel said that some people might not understand that fanatics are not as much of a minority as some would like to think, and that no religious group, including Judaism, is immune to fanaticism.

"The challenge is that it is now a world phenomenon. It is not only in Islam, it is also in Catholicism and Protestantism, and fundamentalists are even within our own community, the Jewish community. Luckily, it is a very small minority, but we have our own fanatics," Wiesel said.

Elie Wiesel

Despite the many atrocities taking place around the world, such as the humanitarian crisis currently taking place in Darfur, Wiesel said he is encouraged by the disproportionate number of Jewish people who choose to stand up for the victims of fanaticism.

"I am deeply involved in the tragedy in Darfur. They organized a few weeks ago in Washington, D.C., a great march for Darfur and 90 per cent were Jews and I was very pleased. There were young people from high school and colleges, people from yeshivot and this pleased me," Wiesel said.

"The overwhelming majority of those [at the rally] came from Jewish homes or Jewish schools."

Wiesel, who speaks passionately about the victims in Darfur, said the best way to incite change is to appeal to the people who have the power to do something.

"I think we should prevail on our governments because they have the power and the money and they have the means. All we have are words."

"We have to speak up. Each in his or her own circle. Sign petitions… We must do something otherwise we will feel guilty for not helping those who need help saving their lives."

Seeking humanity from Damascus

Forty-one years ago last week, on May 18, 1965, Eli Cohen was hanged in Damascus. The son of Shaul and Sofie Cohen, he was tortured, tried without the benefit of legal representation and convicted as a spy for the Jewish state and summarily executed in a public square.

His story became legend. His brilliant, courageous efforts behind enemy lines played a significant role in Israel's ultimate victory against the Syrian forces on the Golan Heights in the Six Day War of 1967. Embarrassed, the Syrian regime treated Cohen with great revulsion and cruelty. To this day, more than four decades after his execution, the Syrians petulantly, callously, vindictively still refuse to allow Cohen's body to be buried in Israel.

Before she died, Cohen's mother exacted a promise from her son Maurice to bring Eli's remains out of Syria for burial in a Jewish grave in Israel. Despite his unceasing efforts, however, Maurice has been unable to find humanity or move conscience within the Syrian regime. Eli's tortured body remains, disrespected and derided, somewhere in Syria. But Maurice, alas, can no longer continue. As he told The CJN last week, he is too ill to maintain the struggle. He fears, with justification, the son's promise to his mother will be unfulfilled. "I don't know how much I have to live... Unfortunately, I couldn't keep my promise. I have not succeeded."

But Maurice need no longer carry the burden of his promise alone. We must help him. His plea to the Syrians is not in the realm of politics. It is, rather, in the realm of basic, simple, human decency. It is a final act of love of a son for his mother, and of one brother for another. To accede to his plea would entail no loss of face on the part of Syria. Rather, it would acknowledge a common humanity in all God's creations.

Therefore we appeal to individuals, schools, organizations, synagogues, churches and mosques. Mobilize for Maurice. Get as many people as possible to sign the online petition that is now circulating on the specially created website (www.elicohen.org).

We also appeal to the government of Canada to use its good offices to try to persuade the government of Syria to confer so uncomplicated an act of simple kindness for the Cohen family.

And we especially appeal to Bashir Assad, the president of Syria. Let Eli's remains be buried in Israel. What better way to show the West, the world, that Syria understands and abides by the norms of civilized society and wishes to be counted among the nations of such society?

Maurice needs our help. He cries out to us from the fading light of his ebbing life and from the depths of his anguish. We must try to help him keep a promise to his departed, heart-broken mother. His cause affirms the value of all human life. It is thus our cause, too, which his cry from the heart expresses.

25 years ago in The CJN

Politician David Lewis, a former leader of the federal New Democratic Party (NDP) and MP for Toronto's York South riding, died of leukemia in Ottawa. He was 71. Lewis was active in socialist causes from a very young age, including the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation (CCF), the NDP's predecessor.

Jewish unity unattainable

The continuing debate about the community Yom Hashoah observance in Toronto has exposed some sensitive issues. In the letters of May 11, we were witness to a Conservative rabbi giving advice to Orthodox rabbis on how to interpret Halachah ("Yom Hashoah memorial program (1)").

As wonderfully ecumenical as this sounds, it glosses over the obvious fact that the various movements of Judaism have fundamentally different conceptions of the meaning of Jewish law, its origins and its role in life. These differences are unreconcilable. It is not reasonable to expect the various movements within Judaism to compromise on their core beliefs in the name of the unattainable goal of Jewish unity.

Perhaps the various factions within Judaism should be encouraged to work together as a community where possible without compromising their integrity and to go their separate ways when such is impossible. After all, even the best of neighbours need to maintain a healthy distance from each other in order to protect their own integrity.

End exclusionary stance

I must take issue with both sides in the ongoing debate over the community observance of Yom Hashoah in Toronto, as reflected in the articles "Board of rabbis withdraw from the Yom Hashoah event" (CJN, April 21) and "Why we chose not to take part" (CJN, April 27), and the May 11 letters to the editor.

While I deplore the decision taken by the Toronto Board of Rabbis, which caused so much unnecessary conflict and dissension in the community, I am more distressed at the grounds on which this decision was based and the inference, by their exclusion, that Jewish women/girls are somehow less worthy of participation.

I come from an Orthodox family that suffered deportation and the loss of female family members. I never heard any reference to the Holocaust in my family lest God's name be profaned. And today, in 2006, for the sake of that same Halachah, we exclude our Jewish daughters from participating in an event commemorating the slaughter of our Kedoshim – male and female alike!

While I do not blame the organizers of the event, I appeal to them, and the organizations in charge of this event, to resolve the matter in a rational and sensible way, without discrimination.

In all the years I have been going to the community Yom Hashoah commemoration, I have yet to see more than barely a handful of Orthodox people in attendance. So let's face it, those who so far attended will continue to attend, and those who don't and never have will continue to stay away.

Let's hope that this exclusionary stance will come to an end. Surely we, the generation of survivors, are bound to do honour to those holy souls by seeing to it that our remembrance service reflects the depth of our sorrow – not our fruitless, sectarian differences.

Films celebrated anti-Israel activists

I was impressed with the lineup of prestigious sponsors of the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival, including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canada-Israel Committee, both organizations known for their advocacy and unwavering support for the State of Israel. Imagine my surprise when I realized that among the movies presented with the financial support of the Jewish community were two documentaries celebrating two of the fiercest anti-Israel activists, Daniel Barenboim and Tony Kushner.

Kushner, a scriptwriter, has repeatedly denied even the need for Israel to exist. He is a ferocious enemy of Israel, accusing it, among other "sins," of ethnic cleansing, murder, atrocities and racism. For the festival organizers, however, it was an opportunity to present a "loving portrait" of Kushner.

Barenboim – once a musical prodigy and a child of Holocaust survivors, now an anti-Israel and pro-Palestinian propagandist – was honoured with a documentary about him that was even chosen to be the closing night film. Barenboim called Israel "a state ruled by apartheid," called Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "arrogant and uncivilized," and even refused to speak to a reporter from the Israel's Army Radio because she was wearing an Israel Defence Forces uniform. The same Barenboim enjoyed playing music with former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat present but stated that he would not invite former Israeli primer minister Ariel Sharon to his performances.

Of course, a film festival should present a multitude of ideas and allow a wide range of artistic expression. I only question the wisdom of channelling funds from organizations that represent the Jewish community and express our support for and solidarity with Israel to a festival that openly celebrates enemies of the Jewish state.

'Jerusalem is the heart of the State of Israel'

This year, we celebrate the 39th anniversary of the reunification of Jerusalem. In commemoration of the event, Jerusalem Day, the 28th day of Iyar, which falls this year on May 25, we publish this excerpt from a statement about Jerusalem by Israel's founding prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, that he delivered in 1949. At the time, the United Nations was debating a suggestion championed by the Catholic Church, and supported by others, to internationalize the city. It's important to keep Ben-Gurion's words close to heart even now, nearly 60 years after the debate. Alas, there are forces in the world that are still trying to separate Jerusalem from Israel.

"In the fall of 1949, the General Assembly of the United Nations began debating how to implement its decision of 29 November 1947 regarding the establishment of Jerusalem as a separate international entity under the auspices of the United Nations.

"On the eve of the debate, on 5 December 1949, I announced, in a Knesset session, that Jewish Jerusalem is an organic and inseparable part of the State of Israel. I added that Israel could not even conceive that the United Nations would attempt to tear Jerusalem from the State of Israel, especially considering what Jerusalem went through during Israel's War of Liberation.

"At the same time, we see fit to state that Jewish Jerusalem is an integral part of Jewish history and belief. Jerusalem is the heart of the State of Israel. We are proud of the fact that Jerusalem is also sacred to other religions, and will gladly provide access to their holy places and enable them to worship as and where they please, co-operating with the UN to guarantee this.

"We cannot imagine, however, that the UN would attempt to sever Jerusalem from the State of Israel or harm Israel's sovereignty in its eternal capital.

"Twice in the history of our nation were we driven out of Jerusalem, only after being defeated in bitter wars by the larger, stronger forces of Babylon and Rome. Our links with Jerusalem today are no less deep than in the days of Nebuchadnezzar and Titus Flavius, and when Jerusalem was attacked after the 14th of May 1948, our valiant youngsters risked their lives for our sacred capital no less than our forefathers did in the time of the first and second Temples.

"A nation that, for 2,500 years, has faithfully adhered to the vow made by the first exiles by the waters of Babylon not to forget Jerusalem, will never agree to be separated from Jerusalem. Jewish Jerusalem will never accept alien rule after thousands of its youngsters liberated their historic homeland for the third time, redeeming Jerusalem from destruction and vandalism."

Greening my ride

At age 55, I acquired my first car. Until then, I drove my father's or my husband's car. Admittedly, my husband's car was the family car that I jointly owned, but we all knew it was really his. Strangely and belatedly, a car symbolized my coming-of-age and independence.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

When I began a sabbatical in 1999, I needed a car to travel between Boston and Montreal. I loved my black Honda and my transformation. I could drive easily (and sometimes too quickly) to any destination. With the roof open, Barbara Streisand on the stereo and lots of snacks, I was the epitome of "have car, will drive."

So it came as quite a shock when two years later, my husband suggested that we get rid of our second car. How could he? I asked friends to convince him that two cars are essential for a double income family. His reasons were both practical and rational, but I couldn't give up the car and all that it symbolized.

Yet, the crux of his proposal matched a second epiphany that I had when I returned from my sabbatical.

I no longer drove to school. I walked.

For the past six years, I have walked to work every morning. No matter what the weather (and rain is far worse than snow, cold or ice), I walk. Even my doctor once tried to give me a lift on a rainy day, but I declined.

And the car sat in the driveway.

I felt very righteous – I was helping the environment and getting exercise to boot. Mostly, I liked having time to myself. There is nothing comparable to the feeling of personal time and space. This was the stuff of true independence. I finally came around: we got rid of the car and saved money, and I no longer had to wait for CAA to boost a dead battery.

Now that I am a confirmed and compulsive walker, I wonder about our wasteful transportation styles. Why do people drive everywhere? Why not use public transportation or car pools? Cars are perhaps more convenient and a sign of affluence, but they're detrimental to our lifestyle in the final analysis.

We should do more as private citizens to maintain our resources and contain our excesses. As I found out, the symbolic value attributed to a car was ill-founded. Most of us quickly become enslaved to our cars and what we think they represent. I'm not suggesting that there be no cars, just a more judicious use of our resources

Now that I don't have a car, my husband picks me up after work. Now that I don't have a car, my husband has to do all the household errands. So, I ask you, who is liberated?

Spain, then and now

In a few weeks, we will be on a plane to Spain, where we hope the rain will stay far, far away from us! The purpose is to visit friends and places where Jews lived and prospered for so many centuries.

In preparation for the journey, I picked up Jane Gerber's The Jews of Spain: A History of the Sephardic Experience. Her book follows the Jews in Spain from their earliest settlements – probably beginning during the Second Temple period when Spain was within the political/cultural Greco-Roman world – until their almost complete exodus from Arab lands in our lifetime. It's a lot to get into one book, and of course, Gerber can only give an overview, but it put the longevity of the Jewish Spanish community into perspective.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

As a community under the Visigoths, Jews had to "disperse or go underground," she writes. But with the coming of the Muslims to Spain, Jews and Judaism flourished. Even under Christian rulers, Jews lived openly and acted as intermediaries between the rival Christian and Muslim kingdoms on the Iberian peninsula.

During various periods, Jewish philosophy, religion, economic and political influence, Hebrew poetry, and Kabbalistic studies thrived. The end of the story – at least for Spain – is the well-known rise of Christian triumphalism in the wake of the Christians' final victory over the Muslims, and the expulsion of all Jews in 1492.

Gerber deals with the perennial question of what motivated the mass conversions over more than a century before 1492. I can't do it justice in a few paragraphs, but from her analysis, it seems that beginning in the 13th century, Jews in various communities were subjected to persecution and forced conversions, which began to sap the spiritual energy of the community. As persecutions multiplied, more and more Jews converted, while the choice to remain a persecuted but free minority became more and more circumscribed.

So when the end came in 1492, the conversions were a culmination of events, not a sudden shock wave. And while some would blame the very openness of the Jewish communities and their leaders to the cultures around them, Gerber does not. Rather, she shows the gradual erosion of solidarity under unimaginable pressure and persecution. Then came the Inquisition (which spilled even more Jewish blood), as well as the waning of Spain's power and the growth of rancid racism that targeted Jews whose conversions were suddenly questioned and then spurned as spurious.

All in all, it was an ugly ending to the Golden Age. So why go to Spain?

Well, one could ask that question about almost any European trip. Perhaps the horrors of the last century drive out events of 500 years ago. Or maybe something else is changing. Spain today is not the Spain of the repellent Isabella and Ferdinand, or the brutal fascist Franco. As Gerber points out, the longing for Andalus, for Sepharad, has never died out in the hearts of Sephardi Jews. A new Spain, free of fascism and anti-Semitism, is rising and rising fast. I want to see it.

You can argue that anywhere you go in Europe, you will only find Jews in their graves. Indeed, there are places I won't ever go, places where the ground is soaked with Jewish blood and the cries of the dying can still be heard. But there are places where we might find a new heart and a new spirit. Isn't that what we always pray for, that nations will rise above their history and open their hearts to a new reality?

Sephardi Jewry imagined itself as doubly exiled: first from Zion, the Land of Israel, and then from Spain, their Goldene Medinah. Their homecoming to a Jewish state was a mixed blessing for many of them. Yet the image of exile in their Kabbalah blossomed in the teachings of the mystics of Safed and remains a potent image today. Who knows whether a new Spanish Jewish community will be reborn?

After Spain, we will travel to other places fraught with memories from Jewish history – of both achievements and persecutions – including Venice, whose forced restriction of Jews to a particular part of the city, let's recall, gave us the term "ghetto." More about that in my next column.

Rejecting rejection

Recently, my daughter gave me a book titled Stars of David: Prominent Jews Talk About Being Jewish by Abigail Pogrebin. It is a compilation of interviews with famous Americans, many of whom have kept their Jewish heritage unknown to the American public.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

At first glance, I thought that the topic of the book would provide light, moderately interesting reading – but would not be a weighty tome on aspects of Jewish life, dogma or heritage. Surprisingly, this book did provide food for deeper thought and introduced ideas that I found rather disturbing.

It was interesting to learn about the Jewish background of a number of well-known people who I had not previously known as Jewish. However, the book served as a reminder of how disassociated or separate we have become as members of our community.

The book underscores rejection, describing families who have rejected Judaism and, indeed, some individuals who have almost taken pride in their rejection of their faith, background and roots. There are stories familiar to all of us – even self-designations such as the "anti-Semitic Jew".

There are, of course, many persons around us who have rejected Jewish ritual or formal dogma both in community institutions or at home. Some have rejected religion outright. Statistics indicate that more than 50 per cent of the Jews in our communities are not associated with formal Jewish institutions.

This is not news to any of us. But it serves to remind us not of diversity but of a malaise that is endemic to many communities. It is a phenomenon or an atmosphere of general rejection.

Arguably, this rejection is a part of the modern Jewish experience.

Some Jews reject Reform Judaism. Others reject Orthodoxy. Within the branches of Judaism, we see interpretations of our laws that foster rejection of individuals – gays, lesbians, those who have intermarried, the children of mixed marriages and individuals who have chosen (or converted to) Judaism. And rather than finding a niche for themselves within our diverse community, too many Jews reject their Jewish backgrounds completely. Sometimes these attitudes border on outright hostility.

The plea here is not for universal acceptance of one norm or one belief for all Jews. The plea is for us to turn away from hostility essentially, a rejection of rejection. Rather than living in a milieu of conflict or animosity, we should accept our differences and celebrate what we have in common

What do we have in common? We share a history; we share a heritage; we share the basic moral values that we find in our Torah and writings. As well, we all share the experience of oppression, hate and anti-Semitism. And whether or not we or our families were directly affected, we collectively share the experience of the Holocaust. It is a crude element of our communality, but it is etched into our collective being.

We, of course, should not depend upon oppression and hate to engender a unifying sense of commonness. Many persons around the world target Jews and scapegoat the Jewish world for whatever causes they espouse. There will always be persons who harbour hatred and look for avenues to vent their vile, malicious attitudes.

But Judaism is more than daily rituals and observance of holidays and much more than literal interpretations of ancient script. It is a set of values, a sense of self-identity, a niche in our world, a heritage, our roots. We should emphasize in our lives the values that are basic to the Jewish experience.

Each and every community – religious, ethnic or social – has experienced internal diversity. As members of the Canadian community, we celebrate our differences while, at the same time, enjoying our communal and shared history and experience.

As a Jewish community, we must emphasize acceptance and inclusion so that our members will never feel the need to turn their backs on their heritage.

Iran's budding nuclear program rattles Israel

Since the fall of Iran's monarchy in 1979, Iran has branded itself as Israel's undying enemy, an exemplar of the Muslim crusade against the Jewish state. The Islamic regime in Tehran has regularly excoriated Israel and brazenly called for its elimination from the family of nations.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

But Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the president of Iran since last August, has taken the harsh rhetoric to new and ominous heights.

Ahmadinejad's thunderous tirades, the likes of which major Arab leaders have rarely emulated since the 1967 Six Day War, place Iran in a dubiously unique position in the Muslim world.

Iran's verbal onslaughts can safely be dismissed as the rantings and ravings of an extremist, increasingly isolated regime that is out of touch with modern realities.

But Iran should not be underestimated.

Iran, the world's fourth largest oil producer, is feverishly working to expand its nuclear program. Iran is testing long-range Shihab and Cruise missiles that can hit Israel. Iran actively supports proxies: Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Palestinian areas. Iran played a vital role in the bombings of the Israeli embassy and the Jewish community centre in Argentina in the 1990s, which claimed the lives of more than 100 civilians.

Iran's threats, therefore, must be viewed with the utmost seriousness.

Certainly, the powers-that-be in Israel have no illusions whatsoever about Iran.

Israel's chief of staff, Gen. Dan Halutz, has described Iran as "the sole existential threat facing Israel." His deputy, Gen. Moshe Kaplinsky, has said that he takes Iran's threats at face value. Meanwhile, Shaul Mofaz, the former defence minister, has classified Iran as Israel's most dangerous enemy today.

Concurring with these sober assessments, Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, has said that Israel cannot reconcile itself to the prospect of a nuclear-armed Iran. As he put it, "Israel would not tolerate Iran's acquisition of nuclear weapons. Under no circumstances, and at no point, can Israel allow anyone with these malicious designs against us to have control of [such] weapons that can threaten our existence."

For now, Israel is focusing on the diplomacy to deal with Iran's nuclear ambitions. "We are giving priority at this stage to diplomatic action," said Mofaz this past winter. In line with this approach, Israel is striving to convince the United States and the European Union, and Russia and China as well, that time is of essence in containing Iran, which insists that its nuclear program is only for peaceful purposes.

Israel hopes that outrage over Iran's attempts to enrich uranium, a key step in building an atomic device, will galvanize the world and force Iran to desist. As Israel's former prime minister, Ariel Sharon, suggested last December, Iran is not only Israel's problem, but the world's, too.

For the past few years, diplomacy has turned on efforts by Britain, France and Germany, backed by the United States and Canada, to persuade Iran to abandon its military nuclear program in exchange for economic and political incentives. But when these on-again, off-again talks broke off in mid-2005, Iran restarted the uranium enrichment activities it had suspended.

Last week, European Union foreign ministers in Belgium offered Iran fresh incentives if it accepted international oversight of a civilian nuclear program (to which it is entitled under the Non-Proliferation Treaty).

But as expected, Ahmadinejad rejected the European plan, asserting that Iran's acceptance of the proposal would infringe on its sovereign rights.

His hardline stance put him on a collision course with the European Union and the United States, which are pushing ahead with a United Nations Security Council resolution that would impose sanctions on Iran.

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

China and Russia, with important economic and energy interests in Iran, oppose the resolution, but may yet relent if Ahmadinejad persists with his recalcitrance.

The resolution, if passed, could be enforced by military means, but no one, least of all the United States and Israel, is eager to exercise that option of last resort.

Iran's nuclear infrastructure, however advanced or primitive it may be, would be difficult to consign to oblivion because it is widely spread out and buried deep in bunkers.

But Halutz has said that it "can be destroyed," while Moshe Ya'alon, the former Israeli chief of staff, has said that Israel has the ability to strike it.

If the United States – the world's sole superpower – acts militarily, the consequences could be unpleasant.

Ahmadinejad might cut off the flow of Iranian oil and gas, much as the Arabs did in the wake of the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Alternatively, Iran could unleash a wave of terrorism in which Israel would be one of the first targets. As an adviser to Iran's Revolutionary Guards recently said, a U.S. attack on Iran would be followed by an Iranian retaliatory strike on Israel's main nuclear facility in Dimona. In addition, Iran's defence minister, Mustafa Mohammed Najar, has promised a "swift and final" response to an assault on its nuclear sites.

An Iranian reprisal against Israel would hardly be surprising, given Ahmadinejad's visceral hatred of Israel, a topic he began obsessing about publicly last October in a series of provocative speeches.

He called for Israel to be "wiped off the map." He claimed that the Holocaust is a myth, exploited by the West to implant an imperialist Jewish state in the heart of the Middle East. He stated his belief that the Israelis should be resettled abroad.

As outlandish as these themes sounded outside Iran, they struck a chord in Tehran, appealing to a variety of groups: nationalistic radicals mesmerized by Iran's imperial past, Islamic ideologues fired up by dreams of resurrecting a caliphate stretching across the region and supplanting western influence, and the poorer, downtrodden classes.

Although Ahmadinejad spews a steady stream of venom, he is definitely not the first Iranian leader to demonize Israel.

One of his predecessors, Ali Akbar Rafsanjani, spoke glowingly about the possibility of "nuking" Israel.

Iran's current spiritual leader and Ahmadinejad's mentor, Ayatollah Ali Khamanei, told a Spanish prime minister, Jose Maria Aznar, that "setting Israel on fire" was the first order of business on his agenda.

Shaul Mofaz

Being Khamanei's star pupil, Ahmadinejad is indifferent to the fact that his outrageous statements and allegations place him in the same category as Holocaust denier and neo-Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel.

Never tiring of dwelling on his chief preoccupation, he continually lashes out at Israel.

Two weeks ago, after saying that he was receptive to engaging in dialogue with all countries except Israel, he classified Israel as "a tyrannical regime that one day will be destroyed."

In mid-April, he denounced Israel as a "rotten, dried tree" destined to be annihilated by "one storm."

A week later, he described Israel as "a fake regime" that "cannot logically continue to live on." In the same breath, he urged Europeans to jettison their "anti-Semitism" so that Israelis can "return" to Europe.

These comments have infuriated Israelis.

Shimon Peres, the normally cautious deputy prime minister, has declared that "Iran, too, can be destroyed."

And in a not-too-subtle reference to dictators who have suddenly vanished from the scene, Mofaz warned Ahmadinejad that such tyrants have "brought only destruction upon their own people."

At the end of the day, though, what most concerns Israel is when Iran will join the nuclear club.

Meir Dagan, the head of the Mossad, has told the Knesset that Iran will be capable of producing fissile material – the primary building block of a bomb – within a matter of months. Taking his cue from Dagan, Gen. Amos Yadlin, the chief of military intelligence, said that Iran will be in possession of nuclear weapons by 2010. According to Halutz, Iran will be able to build an atomic bomb by 2008 at the earliest and by 2015 at the latest.

Whatever the date, Israel is taking no chances, assuming that Iran's intentions are malevolent.

Five months ago, Israel conducted the 14th test of its Arrow anti-ballistic missile, and last month, it launched the Eros B spy satellite.

In Israel, all eyes are on Iran's budding nuclear program.

UIA Federations Canada celebrates 40 years in Israel

Canadians have funded more than 200 projects in Israel

By DANIEL HOROWITZ & DVORA WILSHANSKY

UIA Federations Canada recently celebrated Israel's 58th Independence Day and launched its 40th year in Israel at a mega-event held on the 625-acre Biblical Landscape Reserve, Neot Kedumim, located between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

UIA Federations Canada, supported by UJA/CJA campaigns across Canada, represents Canadian Jewish Federations.

"When UIA was formed 40 years ago, it was the ultimate statement of support from the Canadian Jewish community in response to the crisis and victory of the 1967 war," says UIA Federations Canada president Stanley Plotnick. "It signaled the readiness of Canadian Jewry to share in the responsibility for securing and developing Israel and ensuring an intimately intertwined relationship with all elements of Israeli society."

"The Canadian Jewish community is one of the most dominant and vibrant Jewish communities in the world, and has been accompanying the State of Israel since its birth in 1948," says Yossi Tanuri, UIA Federations Canada Director-General in Israel.

Over the last 40 years, UIA has established more than 240 physical projects in 85 locations, including kindergartens, libraries, auditoriums, community centres, and sports facilities. The most famous Canadian project is Canada Centre in Metulla, on Israel's northern border. Canada Centre's celebrated facilities include Israel's only Olympic-size skating rink.

Canadian support for aliyah and absorption has helped more than three million olim from 72 countries come home to Israel.

Canadians also show their overwhelming support through missions and visits; 13,000 Canadian students – the majority from Toronto - have already participated in Taglit birthright israel and over 1,000 have participated in the March of the Living.

"Israel plays such an important part in our life today and, as a Canadian Jew, I can't imagine our life without a link to it," says UJA Federation chair David Engel. "UIA Federations Canada is that link to Israel and to the people of Israel."

UIA Federations Canada executive vice president Maxyne Finkelstein, speaks with great pride about UIA's contributions. "UIA is the voice of Canada in Israel," says Finkelstein. "In the 40 years we've been in Israel, we've built hundreds of essential social facilities."

"Wherever you go in Israel, people you meet know the name UIA Federations Canada, and what that partnership has meant to Israel," adds Steve Ain, senior vice president, integrated development, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and the executive vice president of UIA Federations Canada from 1991 to 2001.

"I believe that the greatest achievement of UJA Federation has been the empowerment of Canadian Jewry and, because of UIA Federations, we are considered the most dynamic Jewish community in the world," says Ted Sokolsky, UJA Federation president and CEO. "Because of UIA, we have these incredibly strong links to Israel and, more importantly, we have incredibly strong links to each other."

Hundreds of thousands of Israeli citizens have benefited from Canadian funding throughout the years, through more than 1,000 programs all over Israel, from Eilat in the south to Metulla in the north, with an emphasis on supporting vulnerable communities in sensitive, peripheral locations; scholarships for higher education; recreation and hot meals for children at risk and many more initiatives.

Special connections include Toronto's long-standing partnership with Eilat and the surrounding area of Eilot.

"Canada's partnership with Israel is a long, exciting and proud relationship that has yielded wonderful benefits to both Canadians and Israelis," says Plotnick. "Our 40th anniversary is clearly a promise of our dedication to the future. We are here as one family, together forever."

MASA offers a unique journey to Toronto's Jewish students

An innovative initiative for Jewish students around the world is underway, which promises to not only connect them to their roots in Israel – but to a brighter future, as well. And now, Toronto students can participate, thanks to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto donors and UJA's endowment arm, the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

MASA, which means "journey" in Hebrew, is a joint venture of the Government of Israel and the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) – UJA Federation's overseas partner.

The mandate of MASA is to bring 20,000 young Jews from around the world each year for anywhere from a semester to a year-long program of studying and volunteering in Israel. Qualifying students have more than 140 programs to choose from.

"We are excited that this year our area applicants will have the opportunity to benefit from this wonderful new initiative," says Dani Fine of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education. "In essence, with the advent of this new partnership, we are collectively creating increased scholarship capacity for Canadian students, creating the chance for them to participate in exciting and enriching long-term Israel programs and experiences. In fact, through scholarship funds currently established with the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, over 200 post-secondary school scholarships are awarded to Canadian students. Now, with this partnership, that number will quickly increase at an impressive rate."

For 18-year-old Yael Smiley of Thornhill, the funding she received through MASA has changed her life forever.

"Coming here, I was just thrilled to know that I was going to wake up in Israel every morning. For me, it was just about being in this incredible country," says Smiley, who graduated from CHAT in Richmond Hill last year. "I've had the most amazing year here, away from the rat-race, where I've been able to simply think and absorb so many different lessons and life experiences. I've heard many people say that they go to Israel to find themselves. For me, I believe I came to Israel to create myself."

MASA participants enjoy a visit to the Kotel.

"It was such a fantastic year for Yael, full of growth and great experiences," says her mother, Aviva Silverman. "She's coming home in a week or so with a much stronger sense of her Jewish identity, an identity which was already quite strong."

"Where the incredibly successful and visionary birthright israel initiative was our children's first love affair with Israel, MASA is the more mature, long-term commitment with her," says Julia Koschitzky, a leader of Toronto's Jewish community and the co-chair of JAFI's education department. "Former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon, [now in a coma from a massive stroke], was so thrilled and excited about MASA. In fact, I was with him in Israel last year when it was launched. Studies have shown that those young Jewish men and women - between the ages of 18 and 26 - who spend time in Israel are more likely to become Jewish community leaders, and many, ultimately, make aliyah. MASA will create Jewish leaders; it will connect the disconnected with their roots. This incredible project is essential because not only will it enhance our collective future as Jews, it will guarantee that future."

Mayor Miller, Police Chief Blair to lead Walk With Israel

May 28 event attracts two of Toronto's top leaders

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

Participants in the Sunday, May 28 UJA Federation Walk With Israel will be following in the footsteps – literally – of two gentlemen who make the city tick.

Toronto's Chief of Police Bill Blair will join Mayor David Miller in leading this year's Walk.

"I believe that the participation of both Mayor Miller and Chief Blair speaks volumes about the respect both gentlemen have for Toronto's remarkable Jewish community," says UJA Federation chair David Engel. "It also speaks to the importance of this annual event which year after year – brings out thousands of members of our community. As two men who both clearly value diversity and tolerance, they will both be valued guests at the Walk With Israel."

"It's terrific that both Mayor Miller and Chief Blair are going to be kicking off this year's Walk With Israel: to know how much they value their relationship with our Jewish community," says Sara Zagdanski, co-chair of this year's Walk, along with Felicia Posluns and Nelly Zagdanski.

"Our relationship with Toronto's Jewish community has always been a strong one," says Chief Blair. "Toronto is known for its multiculturalism and I am committed to working with all of Toronto's cultural and ethnic groups. I meet with different groups almost on a daily basis and to have the opportunity to spend some time with the Jewish community is something I look forward to."

Nancy Klein, who's a loyal Walk With Israel participant, is particularly enthusiastic about Mayor Miller and Chief Blair's participation in this year's event.

"I spoke to Chief Blair at last year's Walk and he didn't act like he was there just to be seen; he was happy to meet with members of the Jewish community," says Klein. "As for Mayor Miller, I saw him at the recent Yom Hashoah commemoration service at Earl Bales Park. He was so respectful, he wore a kippah, and he was singing Hatikvah, word-for-word."

This year's UJA Federation Walk With Israel will be held – rain or shine - on Sunday May 28, beginning at 9:30 am at Coronation Park (the corner of Strachan and Lakeshore) and ending with the RioCan Carnival at Ontario Place.

Each Walk With Israel "Nosh Stop" will feature music, carnival games and activities. Walkers will be entertained by DJs from five different companies: Corey Mandell Entertainment, Superior Sound, Mint Events, Magen Boys Entertainment and Sole Power. Throughout the route, replicas of Arr-yeah the Lion will lead children on the Office Super Centre Treasure Hunt.

The Walk With Israel raises money for at risk Jewish youth in Toronto, Israel and around the world.

PM Mission to Israel and Greece

*Thirty-seven leading UJA Federation of Greater Toronto donors recently took part in the 10-day UJA Federation Prime Minister's Mission to Israel and Greece, chaired by Jeffrey Rubenstein and Alan Gozlan. While in Greece, participants toured Athens' Jewish Museum and the Athens Synagogue, followed by a special tour of the Acropolis and the Parthenon. Members of the mission were also treated to dinner at the home of Israels Ambassador Ram Aviram, where they met with several members of Athens' Jewish community. # Five year old fundraiser is a Walk role model

To hear him speak, it's hard to believe that Zachary Leyderman is only five years old. Truth is the poised and articulate youngster, a student at Temple Kol Ami's supplementary school in Thornhill, who recently addressed 200 of his fellow students about the importance of tzedakah, may well have a career as a motivational speaker ahead of him.

"It was unbelievable to see and hear my five-year-old son standing up there, talking to all these people about the Walk With Israel and the importance of tzedakah, and how they could sponsor him," says Zachary's proud mom, Alexandra. "Quite honestly, I was on the verge of tears seeing how passionate he was about helping others. It was pretty overwhelming."

After having participated in last year's Walk With Israel without being sponsored, Zachary and his mom decided that this year would be a great time for the young man to begin his career in tzedakah and volunteerism within Toronto's Jewish community.

So, with mom's help, the youngster visited the UJA Federation Walk With Israel website at www.ujawalkwithisrael.com where he quickly set up his own customized Walk donation web page under the name "Zachary TKA".

"He's very close to reaching his goal of at least $1,800 raised for the Walk, and most of that money was pledged to him on his sponsorship web page," says Alexandra. "After he spoke to his classmates, we received cash from a lot of the other parents at the school, but the donation page has been tremendous."

"I told everyone at the Saturday Family Program that my name was Zachary Leyderman, and that I'd like all the kids from Temple Kol Ami, and their parents, to sponsor me for the Walk With Israel and, if they could, walk with me, too," says Zachary. "I wanted to do this because some people – even kids – in Israel are poor and we don't want that. By me walking and raising all this money, maybe some of those people won't be poor anymore. My cousin Sunny also lives in Haifa."

"The satisfaction in a youngster's eyes and their smiles when you hand them a donation is proof positive that they are learning early the simple pleasure of helping others, and the mitzvah of contributing to the community," says Sara Zagdanski, the co-chair of the Walk, along with Nelly Zagdanski and Felicia Posluns.

For Toronto's Bradley Pines, 7, a student at Beth Tzedec, the Walk With Israel is something he and his brother Jordan look forward to year after year.

"Last year I raised a few hundred dollars, and this year I hope to raise more," says Bradley. "It's important that I can help other kids who need it here and in Israel, and I can do it by walking with my brother Jordan, and the rest of my family and my friends, too."

"Being involved in the community as both a volunteer and as a professional, my husband David and I are so proud of our sons, both of whom were taught very early about the importance of giving back to their community," says Bradley's mother, Andrea Pines, coordinator of volunteer services at Jewish Family & Child Service. "We always taught them to save a little, spend a little, but always give a little, and the Walk With Israel is a perfect vehicle for them to practice that philosophy."

Two cemeteries open up community sections

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For the first time ever, community sections are available in two existing Jewish cemeteries within the City of Toronto.

Both Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park, near Steeles Avenue and Bathurst Street, and Shaarei Shomayim Congregation's McCowan Road Cemetery on McCowan Road south of Eglinton Avenue now have plots available for people who do not belong to a synagogue, society or organization.

Sol Zeifman, president of Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park Association, which manages 55 cemetery sections that make up the 26-acre cemetery, says that about 390 plots are available at the cemetery for about $3,000, plus foundation, and about 1,000 plots are available at McCowan Road for about $990, plus foundation.

Each organization affiliated with the cemetery owns its own property, says Zeifman, and the association acts like a property manager. It makes sure the grounds are maintained and access remains clear, and that the foundation is set for the headstones.

"The operation is similar to a big business, and we are all volunteers," says Zeifman, who has been involved with the cemetery for about 16 years.

Several years ago, a group that includes Zeifman, Allan Applebaum, Harvey Brenman and Carl Kellen formed Jewish Cemetery Management Inc. at Bathurst Lawn, which takes on the work of organizations that no longer want to operate their cemetery sections themselves.

"By doing this, we are ensuring that outsiders don't come in to do the work, and that things get done properly," Zeifman says.

The surplus funds obtained from selling the community plots will be used to plant trees, increase parking and sidewalks, and improve security, he says.

Since 2000, he says, the group has made a number of improvements at Bathurst Lawn, including putting up new information signs, planting trees, and paving sidewalks.

"Our aim is to make the cemetery visit as esthetically and emotionally pleasant as possible."

After being approached a number of times about the possibility of accommodating non-members, he says, the group decided to investigate.

"We did find one dead end section that wasn't used, and the organization [responsible for the land] transferred ownership to our management company.

"We had to excavate, [prepare the land] and divide the old road into two sections."

He got involved with McCowan Road Cemetery, he says, when he became a member of Shaarei Shomayim and was asked to help clean it up.

"We saw an opportunity to open up some plots for community use, and we split the cemetery into two sections, divided by a cedar hedge."

Providing community sections, Zeifman says, "will make it easier for those who are not affiliated with an organization or synagogue."

For information, call Lynn England at Bathurst Lawn, 416-223-1373 or Marilyn, Rochelle or Esther at Shaarei Shomayim, 416-789-3213.

Or HaEmet plans fundraising dinner

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Or Haemet Sephardic School in Thornhill, Ont., will honour Messod and Brenda Boussidan next month at a dinner to raise funds for a Judaic studies library at the school.

The Boussidans, who have been involved with Or Haemet for more than a decade, will be named this year's Yachin ou Boaz – named after the two pillars that supported the Beit Hamikdash (Temple) in Jerusalem – to recognize their contribution to the vibrant Sephardi community in Toronto.

Jeff Toledano, who is co-chairing the event with Les Fluxgold, said he hopes about 300 people will come to the dinner on June 13 at the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill. Tickets are $125.

The proceeds will go toward building a Judaic studies library for the school, which Messod said is essential to provide young scholars with the foundation for a Jewish education.

"A central feature of identity as Jews is Torah scholarship of our rabbis that has been amassed over thousands of years. The books that will fill our library and will be accessed by the young children of Or Haemet will, we trust, enhance their love of Torah scholarship, and consequently fortify their Jewish identity," Boussidan said.

Toledano said the Boussidans deserve to be honoured for their dedication to the community.

"In recognition of their hard work over the years, we're dedicating the library to Messod and Brenda," he said. "The two of them, ultimately, they give of themselves 110 per cent. They are constantly supportive both in a financial way, in all aspects of the school and the Sephardi community. Without them, we'd be facing many more challenges."

"People have a tremendous respect for Brenda," said Jimmy Kadosh, the current school president.

"Messod gave his time, he dedicated himself to the school. Brenda has been involved with the school even longer. Their three kids all went to the school and are very Zionist," he said, adding that their oldest daughter has made aliyah.

Although Messod himself was reluctant to speak about being honoured by the school, he did explain the importance of being involved with the community.

"In the Sephardi community, as it has been the case in all Jewish communities throughout the ages, the educational institutions for young children have served as the foundation of our community's existence and ability to grow and prosper. Accordingly, our involvement with our community's school has been most meaningful and fulfilling to us," he said

Those scheduled to speak at the dinner include Rabbi Amram Assayag, the spiritual leader of the Sephardic Kehila Centre, and Rabbi Eli Mansour, the spiritual leader of Ahi Ezer Torah Center in Brooklyn, N.Y., who will deliver a keynote address.

Important to perform acts of kindness

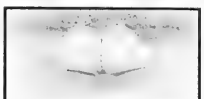
By RABBI YOSSI MICHALOWICZ



Rabbinic Reflections

This week we begin the fourth book of the Torah with parshat Bamidbar, which discusses the 40-year journey of the Jewish People in the desert after the exodus.

The Torah tells us that all their material and spiritual needs were taken care of. They had ample food and water from the daily falling of the manna and the constant flow of water from the well of Miriam. The clouds of glory provided them with a climate-controlled 21-degree temperature. Their clothes never wore out. They did not even need to eliminate waste from their systems!

The people were also spiritually cared for, as Moses led an esteemed learning kollel. Since the Jews had no lack of material needs, they could spend all day long studying and perfecting their relationship with the Almighty and among themselves.

It would seem that they lacked nothing. They were in a perfect world. But is that so?

The Torah tells us the world is built on kindness. The true meaning of this statement is that the purpose of this world is for man to perfect his being by practising kindness on a daily basis. The rabbis tell us that one of the reasons the Almighty chooses to have poor people is to enable the rich to have the merit of showing kindness to the poor. The world has no purpose if there is no active kindness.

Rav Yitzchak Kalish of Vorka, an 18th-century chassidic master, asks: How were the Jews able to exercise kindness when they were in the desert if HaShem took care of their every need? Who was impoverished and in need of help?

We say in the Ashrei prayer "Lehodia livnai ha'adam Gevurotav" - tzaddikim inform people of His strength. The chassidic masters say it means more than that. The role of a tzaddik is to teach people the unbelievable gevurah, or potential strength of character, that they have within themselves. A good teacher can draw out all the potential talents from a child, by telling him he has a great deal of power that he is not aware of.

Hillel, who represented chesed (good works), was a master of this. The greatest chesed you can do for a Jew is to show him how much strength he has and give him greater aspirations.

The rabbis tell us that the manna could taste like anything the person eating it wanted it to. However, many Jews who had been slaves never tasted any really good foods all their lives. Those who had not been slaves could therefore perform the kindness of telling the others about better tasting foods that they could now think of.

On a deeper level, this ultimate kindness would be to teach former slaves to stop thinking like slaves and actualize the freedom they now have.

The portion of Bamidbar almost always falls on the Shabbat before Shavuot – the day we commemorate the receiving of the Torah at Sinai. On that day, we achieved the fourth and final level of redemption from Egypt – the freedom to make a difference in the world.

We live in a society where our physical quality of life far surpasses that of any earlier generation. We seem to lack nothing. Yet ironically, its subliminal messages slowly tear away at our God-given freedom of choice, which is our ultimate freedom. Many people today have left the true thinking to the media and others. The greatest kindness we can do for our fellow Jews is to teach them that we are indeed a "Kingdom of priests and holy people" with a higher calling, purpose and ability to think independently.

This week's Torah portion should motivate us all to empower others to realize their true greatness and potential as found in the Torah – the book of instructions for living.

Between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem on the Eve of Memorial Day

Guest Voice

By MARK ELLIOTT SHAPIRO

Translated and adapted by the author

Today is her birthday
My mother's birthday
She would have been happy to know
That I am continuing to write

Writing a poem
Between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem

And in Hebrew
My mother tongue
My mother's tongue

Language of my land
My beloved land
Land of milk and honey
The milk of its weekdays
Which give us the strength
To enjoy the honey
Of its Sabbaths

Language of my country
The holy State of Israel
That I love
As a man loves a woman
As a mother loves her infant child
As a flower loves her merciful sun

My mother
Would have been happy
To know that I wrote this song

As I am travelling between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem
On the eve of Memorial Day
With a baseball cap on my head
Bearing the word Canada
In red on a white background
Red and white
Blue and white
Two flags in my heart
Two mother tongues
Hebrew and English
In my head
And in my heart
And my father tongue
My father's tongue
French
In my blood

A coming together
A Farbrengen
In an Egged bus
Egged connotes joining together
A joining together of languages
A joining together
Of diverse fragments
Into one nation
A joining together of cities
Across time
Across history
Tel Aviv and Jerusalem

The first Jewish city in modern times
And the first Jewish city
Under David
The first Jewish city
In our hearts
In our memories
"If I forget thee..."
Under the wedding canopy

Lashanah habaah...
Next year in Tel Aviv
This year and forever
In Jerusalem

And this bus
Also joins together
The memories
And the soldiers
Who fell in 1948 and before that fateful year
In Palestine
Under the British
And the Turks
In the War of Independence
In the Sinai Campaign
In the Six Day War
In this war
And that war
In all the wars
In all the flames
That have turned into one flame
The large cardboard flame
Standing at attention
Throughout this land

And all the soldiers
Are joined together
Into one community

One cardboard flame
In memory of the fallen
But in Hebrew we use the present tense
In memory of the falling

A joining together
Across time
Across history

In memory of the falling soldiers
Not in the past
Not some distant past

Between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem

But in the present

An eternal present

Somewhere
Between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem

Halachic privacy rights

Money Matters

Jay Kelman

The right to privacy is one that Jewish law views with great seriousness. It's rooted in the Jewish concept of tzniut, modesty, which serves as a cornerstone of Jewish values. Judaism developed the notion of hezek reiyah, that the viewing of private matters is an actionable tort. While certain property rights can be established over time, this is not the case regarding privacy. If, for example, no protest is lodged by my "trespassing" on your property for use as a shortcut, an easement will be granted allowing my continued use of the property, despite the owner's change of heart. However, despite many years of open access between our backyards, at any moment I can force you to pay your proportionate share of the costs of building a fence. Privacy rights take precedence over established practice.

Furthermore, Jewish law forbids you from constructing a window through which you can see into your neighbour's backyard. If you want to sunbathe, or do any other activity, in your own backyard, you must be allowed to do so without fear of your neighbour's intrusion. Thus, a Jewish court would issue an injunction forcing the owner of the window to cover it up. This is the case even if the window is high above normal eye level, because a ladder can reach the window.

Only the explicit permission of your neighbour would allow you to open a window overlooking a backyard. But even if permission is granted, it applies only to looking into a "courtyard." Having a window of your home face the window of your neighbour is inappropriate, and even if your neighbour gives you explicit permission to do this, that permission can be withdrawn at any time. Rashi interprets the heathen Bilam's words, "How goodly are you tents O Jacob, your dwelling places O Israel" as referring to the fact the doorways of the Jews in the desert did not face one another. Unfortunately, with governments and developers trying to put the maximum number of homes on the minimum amount of space, many of our neighbourhoods are built in violation of this principle.

The prohibition of using your eyes to invade privacy extends to other areas as well. In a famous enactment, Rabbeinu Gershom, the leader of Ashkenazi Jewry at the turn of the 11th century, elevated the prohibition of readings someone's else's mail to one of cherem, or excommunication. Violators would be considered communal pariahs even in death, as no mourning rituals were to be observed for those in cherem, and their remains were not be interred in a Jewish cemetery. No dispensation is allowed if you come across private material through no fault of your own. The prohibition of reading the correspondence of others applies even if the letter is on a postcard.

The applications to the modern workplace are as plentiful as they are obvious. Examining files lying on someone's desk or reading e-mails mistakenly sent to your inbox would be unwarranted invasions of privacy. Nonetheless, no right in Judaism is absolute. In order to protect their investment, employers may monitor the business communications of their workers. This permission would not extend to personal e-mails, which could only be read in cases of suspected misconduct. As Jewish law does not condone secretly gathering data to be used as a punitive measure, employees should be informed of the monitoring policy. Thus the monitoring serves as a warning and deterrent for misuse of privileges instead of a mechanism for disciplinary action. Except in rare circumstances, punitive measures (e.g. dismissal) must be taken only after appropriate warnings are issued in advance.

Cheesecake instead of chicken

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

Goodbye, chicken. Hello, cheesecake. Shavuot is almost here. For a people hooked on a holiday diet of meat and poultry, Shavuot is unique in our gastronomic calendar: a festival that celebrates dairy food.

Shavuot is best known for the giving of the Torah, so why the association with dairy? The Jewish Celebrations site lists six reasons. Two of the most famous: On Shavuot, the Jewish people received a new code of law, including the dietary restrictions that became part of their daily life. Since the new laws of separating meat and milk were still unclear, only dairy products were eaten on Shavuot to avoid transgressing the unfamiliar laws.

And for those into Gematriah, Jewish numerology, "The Hebrew word for milk, chalav, has the numerical value of 40, symbolizing the number of days Moses was on Mount Sinai. Chalav is spelled "chet" (numerical value, eight), "lamed" (30) and "vet" (two)." [http://tinyurl.com/gxxes]

Others look for allusions in the Torah that suggest we eat dairy to symbolize the "land flowing with milk and honey" (Exodus 3:8). Or that the Torah is compared to milk, as is written: "Sweetness drops/ From your lips, O bride; Honey and milk/ Are under your tongue." (Song of Songs, 4:11) [http://tinyurl.com/3534u]

As for the recipes themselves, the Jewish-Food Blintz Archives has three dozen variations including Berry-Topped, New Mexico Kaese and Asparagus and Cheese. [http://tinyurl.com/l7x5p] And if you are tired of the same old chocolate cheesecake, the Jewishfood List has a gut-busting supply of 61 recipes. [http://tinyurl.com/24owf]

Of course, there's more to Shavuot fare than blintzes and cheesecake. At Let's All Eat Dairy, Rosalyn Manesse has prepared a menu with Sephardi-style fish, Linguine Primavera and dairy scones. [http://tinyurl.com/lnkce] At Kosher Delight, you'll find dozens of other ideas including Chana's Grated Cucumber Salad with Pistachios, Raisins and Yogurt and Michael Fierro's Four-Cheese Herb Quiche. [http://tinyurl.com/erok5]

The recipes sound mouth-watering, but what to do about all the calories, saturated fat and cholesterol? Marcy Goldman notes that "Shavuot is not congruent with 'some of the caveats of the American Heart Institute, but you can always substitute low-fat cream cheese, sour cream or any other dairy item so easily available these days. Shavuot is, however, a fine occasion to boost your calcium, so enjoy!" [http://tinyurl.com/p8op8]

While some people will be more than satisfied to pile on the blintzes and cheesecake, for others a Jewish holiday isn't a holiday without a nice piece of chicken. So they dine on both dairy and meat – only not at the same time. In "Cheese Blintzes and Beef Wellington," Rabbi Moshe Donnebaum explains the Shavuot tradition of having a dairy meal shortly followed by a meat one – and the sometimes intricate rules governing all this dining. [http://tinyurl.com/nsvua]

After coming across all these mouth-watering recipes, Linda Morel's article "in praise of a neglected Shavuot soup" hit a nerve. "Schav, the khaki-coloured soup once savoured by Ashkenazi Jews, has fallen on hard times in recent decades," writes Morel. I actually remember eyeing strange bottles in the back of our fridge and wondered who actually would drink that green liquid. Morel explains that "schav is made from milk or cream, simmered with chopped sorrel leaves" and was seen as a refreshing alternative to the bland foods that European Jews had to make do with. But the once-popular food has fallen into disfavour of late. Maybe it's time to rediscover the traditional soup as well as one for Sorrel Potato Salad that Morel supplies. [http://tinyurl.com/cla3a]

The recipes mentioned above are undeniably delicious. But I believe that the tastiest part of any holiday is its memories. I'm sure that Cyndi and her beloved Auntie Rivka would agree. It seems that Cyndi's family had mouse problems in their home and decided to set out some mousetraps. When Auntie Rivka dropped by to make some Shavuot blintzes, her niece quickly scooped the traps up and hid them in the freezer. When her aunt reached into the freezer to put away the cream cheese and – well, let's just say "Auntie Rivka never went into Mother's freezer again." [http://tinyurl.com/j3q55]

"They are our teachers..."

Artist/teacher brings creativity to classroom

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Shlomit Granat-Paldor never wanted to follow in her mother's footsteps and become a teacher.

But things have changed for the 27-year-old sabra, who was born in Haifa and raised in Jerusalem. On Sunday mornings, she teaches Hebrew and Jewish studies at the Hillel Children's Workshop – an arts-based, parent-run Sunday school held at the University of Toronto and during the week, she teaches Jewish studies at United Synagogue Day School's Beth Tzedec branch.

A lesson from the teacher: "Don't go into teaching if you don't love it. You can't fool the students. If you don't find [your lesson] interesting, they won't co-operate."

And she couldn't be happier. "I'm having a good time," she said in an interview recently. "I love it."

What brought about her change of heart? "I grew up," she said.

Her earliest "teaching" experiences were in the field of informal education as a teenage madrichah (leader) in the Orthodox youth group Bnei Akiva.

Along the way, the married mother of one, who is expecting her second child this summer, became an artist. She completed her bachelor's degree at Jerusalem's Bezalel Academy of Art and Design in 2002.

Shlomit Granat-Paldor

In the classroom, she tries to be as creative as possible, both in terms of tweaking her lessons as she goes along and by providing hands-on opportunities for students to create art that is related to what she is teaching. She also tries to foster as much discussion as possible.

"I think the best way of learning is if you experience it, and express yourself in a creative way," she said.

Naturally, she includes artists, songwriters and poets as part of her Jewish history curriculum at Hillel.

Earlier this year, she introduced her students to the work of Israeli poet Nahum Gutman, providing a multi-sensory experience as they acted out the words of one of his poems by savouring the smell, taste and visual appeal of fresh oranges.

She hopes that the lesson is one students will remember for a long time.

In her own student days, she didn't put much effort into things she didn't find interesting. "But," she said, "if I liked a subject, I was there with my heart and soul."

Before relocating to Toronto in 2004, Granat-Paldor was head of the fine arts department at Jerusalem's Torah and Arts High School.

Her own artwork is mostly large-scale sculpture in clay or papier-mâché, and she also enjoys creating textile art and using needlework techniques such as embroidery, even though it's "not very fashionable."

One of her pieces features precise stitching of a traditional Palestinian embroidery pattern on an Israeli army shirt. "It's an impossible combination… a conceptual piece," she said. "I felt maybe in a weird way I could make something beautiful out of this tense situation."

The piece was on display recently in Hamilton at a exhibition featuring the work of Israeli artists. Among them was her father, a doctor who is also a photographer.

But Granat-Paldor also traces some of her artistic ability to her mother. "She's a math teacher, but I think she's very creative."

Festival offers tastes, sounds of Israel

Enjoy the sights, sounds and tastes of Israel at the Canadian Zionist Federation's 11th annual Israel day festival, June 4, 11 a.m. to 5 p.m at Earl Bales Park.

The free, outdoor festival, to be held for the first time this year at Earl Bales, is under the patronage of the Consulate of Israel and features non-stop entertainment and a drum circle led by Erez Ravch of Halleluja Drummers.

An Israeli marketplace will showcase Judaica, Israeli artisans, books, flowers, skin care products, jewelry, shoes, housewares and flags. Activities for kids include arts and crafts, inflatables, clowns and face painters. For older visitors, there will be speed dating organized by Aish HaTorah.

As well, the festival includes cultural and educational exhibits, and a live auction with a variety of merchandise, restaurant vouchers, electronics and art up for bids.

For details, call 416-633-3988 or e-mail czf@ajazo.org.il.

Women's concert planned to help needy families

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Kineret, hailed as the best Jewish Orthodox female singer, headlines a concert for women next month.

Organized by Ezrat Achim, the event will raise money to feed needy Jewish families in Toronto.

Debbie Osiel, a volunteer who sits on the committee for Ezrat Achim – a non-profit charitable organization that provides Jewish families with financial aid, as well as kosher food for Shabbat and Jewish holidays – said the concert was planned to raise money and familiarize the community with their cause.

Elizabeth Beldeb, another member of the Ezrat Achim committee, said the fundraiser is also meant to be a night during which Jewish women, at the women only event, can come together and enjoy an evening of music and song.

"The thing about Kineret is that she is very modern and she basically takes modern songs and changes the words to have a Jewish meaning," Beldeb said.

"Anyone can enjoy it. She sings in French, in Spanish, in Yiddish, in Hebrew… It's nice to know that women from all over the city can come and enjoy the event."

Oziel added that they're "expecting it to be a nice atmosphere where people can come to enjoy the concert, and there is going to be some refreshments."

Special guest performers who will be opening for Kineret on June 6 include the Tiferes Bais Yaacov Choir, Raizie Ben Guigui and Liora Oppenheimer.

There will also be a raffle for prizes, which include jewelry and gift certificates that have been donated.

Ezrat Achim, which means "help for one's brothers" in Hebrew, began offering assistance to Jewish Torontonians in need almost eight years ago.

Feeds about 25 families a week

"It started primarily as a Rosh Hashanah food drive," Osiel said. "Today, we feed around 25 families a week and they are all across Toronto."

Osiel, who is also the recruitment and marketing director for Canada Israel Experience, said that while they still organize food drives, they rely heavily on the generosity of Jewish donors and volunteers.

"We get really generous sponsors within the community who donate food, like Joe Boo's Cookoos," she said, adding that Kosher City helped by packing food for them and delivering it for a small fee.

Osiel said she also gets help from birthright israel alumni who pack and deliver food to the recipients of this service.

"We also use Zareinu dollars [gift certificates used in place of cash]. We give non-perishable food items in a box and some money to go with it," she said.

She said that those who receive assistance from Ezrat Achim are usually recommended by their rabbis, but the organization is non-denominational, meaning they also help secular people.

But Beldeb said that despite the number of families they are able to help through this service, there is a growing need that Ezrat Achim – with a budget of only $85,000 a year – cannot meet alone.

"Unfortunately, there is a waiting list. Hopefully [people] are going to realize the importance of the growing need and poverty in the city… We want people to understand that by giving to Ezrat Achim, every dollar is spent the right way," Beldeb said.

They hope this event will attract at least 400 women and are aiming to raise enough money to cover the cost of feeding families for at least two months.

To feed one family each week for a year, it costs $3,120, or $60 a week.

The concert will be held at the Sephardic Kehilah Centre. Tickets are selling for $45 for premium seats, $30 for general seating and for girls 12 and under, tickets are $18.

To purchase tickets, call 905-669-7654, ext. 223.

Choir reunion to honour Cantor Harold Klein

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

Calling all boys who sang in one of Cantor Harold Klein's choirs.

A number of boys, now men in their 40s and 50s, who sang in the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda (1968 to '72) or Shaarei Shomayim (1972 to '92) synagogue choirs, under the direction of Klein, have formed a committee to plan a reunion to honour him for his contributions to their personal growth and development.

"We want to reach as many former choir members as possible to thank Cantor Klein for his dedication to each of his choir boys," says Israel Ellis, a member of the organizing committee who is in the computer business.

"As I look upon my own little guy today, having recently forced the issue of his participation in a choir, I look for myself in him and hope one day he understands his father's resolve. For it is through Chazzan Klein that I learned to sing, that I learned to close my eyes and let my soul soar with the pronunciation of each letter of the tfillah I say today."

> 'The chazzan had a magical aura about him'

He adds that it is through the song of prayer that he has been able to sustain his connection with God "through the highest and lowest points of my life. And for this I can thank Chazzan Klein."

This sentiment has been expressed by the many men who now want to publicly thank Klein.

"The chazzan had a magical aura about him that attracted kids like the Pied Piper. We want to show our appreciation for a man who dedicated himself to the youth of the shul," Jon Gasner, a dentist who sang with the cantor for 18 years, says.

The biggest task for the committee is to reach many of the former members of both choirs as some have moved away, he says. "We are anxious to locate them."

David Young, an accountant, was the director of the Shaarei Shomayim Boys Choir and is now the cantor at Beth Torah Congregation. He told The CJN of Klein's "utmost dedication to the children in the choir.

"His main goal was to ensure that the children came to shul, and learned how to daven. I remember how before reciting the Shema, he would always take his tzitzit and hold them up high for all the children to see, so they would remember to hold them and kiss them during the prayer."

Young adds that the cantor did much behind the scenes. "I remember the many times he would drive to Buffalo on his own to purchase kosher candy in bulk for the kids, the many hours of re-covering the children's music books, arranging special movie previews, box seats at Maple Leaf Gardens – everything he did was for the children."

It was because of the cantor's dedication and efforts that children as well as their parents and grandparent came to shul, says Young. "The shul was a focal point of activity in the '70s and '80s because of Harold."

In an telephone interview, Klein, who had a stroke four years ago, said that when the committee first approached him with the idea of a reunion he was stunned.

For some 25 years, he worked with hundreds of young boys. He says that working with the boys "usurped my strength for when I came home from choir practice. I said to my wife that I just earned my salary. It is great to see what they have made of themselves many are doctors, lawyers, rabbis, and very successful."

The Cantor Harold Klein Reunion takes place on Sunday, June 11, at 7 p.m. at the Village Shul. For more information, visit www.kleinchoirreunion.com.

The evening also honours the memory of Scotty Goldberg, a member of Klein's choir who made aliyah and died in a suicide bombing.

Fundraiser nets $250,000 for Mount Sinai

New York came to Toronto when more than 400 people enjoyed a cocktail reception, live music and prizes at the seventh annual Leadership Sinai Spring Ball.

Leadership Sinai Presents... A Night in Manhattan was held at the Windsor Arms Hotel and raised more than $250,000 to support research at Mount Sinai Hospital and its Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute.

Leadership Sinai was created in 1993 to offer business and community leaders between the ages of 25 and 50 the "opportunity to make a positive and tangible difference to the future of health care," the organization said in a statement. Among the Mount Sinai projects it has supported are the Leadership Sinai Advanced Surgical Technology Centre; the Leadership Sinai Centre for Diabetes; labour, delivery and recovery rooms; and the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre.

Former Hillel director to lead Betar-Tagar

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Talia Klein, the newly appointed executive director of Betar-Tagar Canada, said her goal is to continue to give Jewish students the opportunity to express their Zionism and Jewish pride on campus.

"The one major objective is to reach out to the Jewish students on campus in a very specific way and meet very specific needs. Those needs are to create a sense of pride and dignity and self-determination," said Klein, who will replace Itay Gadot, a Jewish Agency shaliach who will end his four-year tenure as head of the right-wing Zionist youth group this summer.

"My biggest challenge is giving [students] a sense of security, of sense of pride, being able to wear their Zionism, wear their kippahs with a sense of safety," Klein said.

Gadot said he is thrilled that Klein was chosen to succeed him, adding that no one is a better fit for Betar, which bases its ideology on that of Ze'ev Jabotinsky, the founder of Revisionist Zionism.

"If we were to write a job description, in one word, it would be Talia. I am confident that not only is she going to maintain what we've achieved so far, but she's going to take it to the next level," Gadot said.

'There is a need for a local presence'

In the past, the Betar-Tagar advisory board opted to bring in an Israeli shaliach from the Jewish Agency to run the organization, but this year the board decided that a local representative would serve the community better.

"There is a need for a local presence," said Gadot, who is heading back to Israel in August.

"There is a need for continuity. What happens is that a shaliach comes [on a one-year contract] and it takes him about six months to learn, and then the last six months, the shaliach begins thinking about what is to come," he said.

"Here we have someone who is coming from the community, knows the community and the community of course knows her and there is an element of continuity, an element of stability."

Klein has served the Jewish community as the national chair of the North American Jewish Students Network, as vice-president of the World Union of Jewish Students and as the youngest ever national officer of Canadian Jewish Congress.

After five years of living in Israel, she served until recently as director of Hillel at York University.

To top it all off, Klein, 32, earned a master's degree from the University of Toronto in history, writing her thesis on Jabotinsky's political ideas.

She said she's in awe of how Gadot has built Betar from the ground up into the influential organization it is today.

"I have been in a privileged position to watch what Itay has accomplished over the past 3½ years. When he got here, Betar was really just a name. It was an ethereal concept that was floating around imbued as it is with a very rich heritage, a very rich ideology and a sense of strength and self-determination. He has made it a viable, real, tangible movement on campus," Klein said.

Klein heads to Betar

"All I had was a desk, a phone line and a chair," Gadot added, recalling his first week as Betar's executive director.

"Since then, we've grown in chapters… But more than the number of students, we like to talk about the impact and the effect that we have on the community and student activism, and the fact that it is OK to be Zionist on campus, it is OK to be proud of our heritage and homeland and voice your opinions on it."

Klein expects that her experience with Betar will be much more politically charged than it was at Hillel, where she has worked for the last three years, but she intends to maintain a good working relationship with Hillel, despite the two groups' differences in ideology.

"We're like two currents in a river. Sometimes we join up and sometimes we don't. That is absolutely natural. Both organizations have very clear mandates, and we're not by any means mutually exclusive," she said, adding that the two groups recently worked together on an annual Yom Ha'atzmaut party that Gadot helped found three years ago.

While Klein said that Hillel and Betar have more things in common than not in common, she noted that Hillel's political neutrality and its mandate to cast its net as wide as possible to try to appeal to Jewish students of every stripe differs from Betar's approach.

"It is to the students' benefit that there are various organizations that are able to meet their diversity. We fit a need and at no point are we trying to be everything to every Jewish student on campus. We have a very definite ideology and a very definite message, and we appeal to the students who fall under that rubric," said Klein, who co-produced Qassam, a documentary by Toronto-based Chutzpa Productions about the Negev town of Sderot, which is often attacked by Palestinian Qassam rockets. She also co-produced other Chutzpa films, including Disengaging Democracy, about last year's Gaza pullout, and Not in My Name, about left-wing Zionists.

Klein said she wants to attract even more students to Betar by giving high school students more background about the situation in the Middle East before they enter university.

"The students are not our clients, they are not our customers and we are not a management organization – the students are the organization. They determine the direction, the programs, and we just go along for the ride," Klein said.

"I cannot emphasize enough how proud I am of [the students]. I've seen them grow through the activities and campaigns and I think the community is very fortunate to have them," Gadot added. "They are not tomorrow's leaders, they are already today's leaders in the community."

Dov Bercovici with his wife, Lesley Gaum, and their children, Rebekah and Matthew.

University VP named to 'Top 40 Under 40'

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Dov Bercovici calls himself "a man who loves selling ideas and concepts and finding a common ground with people to see them through."

Described as a "bright and energetic leader who infects others with his commitment and enthusiasm" by Acadia University president Gail Dinter-Gottlieb, Bercovici was recently named one of Canada's Top 40 Under 40 business and community leaders

He was recently recognized in the national program founded and managed by the Caldwell Partners to honour Canadians who have reached a significant level of success but have not yet reached the age of 40.

"I have two years to go to the big 40," said Bercovici, vice-president of operations at Acadia in Wolfville, N.S., about 100 kilometres west of Halifax. His nomination was initiated by longtime Halifax lawyer and Acadia board member Ron Mitton and supported by former employer Fred MacGillivray, chair of Trade Centre Ltd. in Halifax, and by Dinter-Gottlieb.

At Acadia since 2001, Bercovici manages multimillion-dollar budgets, chairs several university committees, negotiates business contracts, has created a program at the university that brings academics' ideas to the marketplace and holds responsibility for generating new university revenues from outside interests.

A Montreal native, he graduated from McGill University with a BA in economics in 1991 and earned a master's degree in business administration at Dalhousie University in Halifax in 1994.

He was general manager of World Trade Centre Halifax from 1995 to 2001, doubling revenue of the member-based organization and assisting more than 200 firms in finding new customers in global markets, while attracting the international World Trade Centre Association with 355 delegates from 90 countries to Halifax for its international conference in 1998.

While at Acadia, Bercovici developed the Acadia Classical International Guitar Festival in 2005. "What I thrive on is finding a new concept, implementing it and seeing it through, from start to finish," he says.

He also marketed an innovative, faculty-owned software company that enables interactive online master music- class instruction. Two faculty members developed the MusicPath software that is now used by schools and conservatories across the country.

"Innovation is the successful implementation of an idea – it's not just the idea," Bercovici said.

In addition, he volunteers in the community.

"I enjoy putting on events that make a difference," says the married father of two.

A member of the Halifax Canadian Progress Club, Bercovici was co-chair of consecutive sport celebrity dinners in 1999 and 2000 that raised $170,000 for a home for mentally challenged adults.

Bercovici has always relied on his people skills to bring together resources and opportunities.

"I can get along with almost anyone," he said. "The major challenge [at Acadia] is to operate in a business manner at a university. You learn to accept little successes."

Canada urged to help in reforming UNRWA

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

David Bedein has visited Canada many times and delivered his appraisal on UNRWA, the UN's agency responsible for Palestinian refugees, on more than a few occasions.

Last week, for the first time, Bedein, bureau chief for the Israel Resource News Agency, was guardedly optimistic that his suggestions on reforming the massive UN agency – to actually push it to rehabilitate and resettle refugees – might actually bear fruit.

Canada, he said, is preparing "for a modest diplomatic step in the Middle East. This is one issue where Canada can take the lead."

Bedein was in Ottawa last week for a series of meetings with parliamentarians, senior officials from the Department of Foreign Affairs and the Prime Minister's Office. Altogether, Bedein briefed about 50 legislators and officials in three meetings, including members of the Canada-Israel Interparliamentary Friendship Group.

He was invited to Ottawa by Jason Kenney, the prime minister's parliamentary secretary.

As chair of the refugee working group, an international body established 15 years ago to examine a solution to the Palestinian refugee question, Canada has some leverage on this issue, Bedein told his hosts.

"Canada has two tremendous opportunities at a time when the political aspects of the process has stalled. Canada can take the lead in looking at the refugee situation as soluble."

Bedein suggested Palestinians languishing in refugee camps face a choice between continued squalor or normalization of their lives. The UN maintains the status quo, he said, and he urged Canadian representatives to "enter dialogue with the refugees themselves" to address the humanitarian issues related to the peace process.

Normalizing Palestinians' lives might also defuse some of the political volatility in the camps, he suggested. "If you have permanent housing around you, you are less likely to be pushing for the 'right of return,'" he said.

Palestinians have called for the right of refugees and their descendants to return to homes in what is now Israel, and they consider that prospect "very real," he said.

Since there are no political prospects that that might occur, Canada could push for rehabilitation of refugees along the lines adopted elsewhere by the UNHCR, the UN agency responsible for refugees everywhere in the world outside the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Bedein also suggested that UNRWA, which Canada funds in part, should not employ members of the terrorist group Hamas.

Kenney was unavailable for comment.

Winnipeg shul, food bank unite to pack food for city's needy

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Last year more than 39,000 people received food each month from the Winnipeg Harvest food bank. More than half were children and many were from single-parent households.

[Rebeca Kuropatwa photo]

On May 11, a team of volunteers from Sha'arey Zedek Synagogue and Winnipeg Harvest worked together packing food for Winnipeggers living well below the poverty line.

"Synagogue volunteers try to come and help out at Harvest six or eight times per year, and in a variety of ways," said the president of Sha'arey Zedek Synagogue, Rick Lee.

"Sometimes Harvest needs us to pack perishables to send out to needy Winnipeg families. Other times, like tonight, we portion out donated rice...

"Many of the synagogue volunteers here tonight are regulars who have been coming to help out at Harvest whenever they can. Members of our synagogue have been volunteering for about three or four years now. Some of the volunteers include three generations of one family."

> 'Making this kind of big difference in people's lives takes so little, but it is so important'

Sha'arey Zedek has founded several programs to help fight hunger and poverty with Winnipeg Harvest.

"We organize group volunteer trips to Harvest for bar and bat mitzvah children with their friends. This is organized as part of the bar and bat mitzvah's training in learning what it is means to live as a responsible, caring adult," said Lee.

"Another one of our programs is bringing children who are having trouble in school to volunteer at Harvest for a course credit."

Norman Bager, a food-bank volunteer from Sha'arey Zedek, said, "My wife was the one who wanted me to come here." When asked if he was glad that he had come, he replied, "Absolutely. Making this kind of big difference in people's lives takes so little, but it is so important. I am glad I came, and I will be back."

Winnipeg Harvest is a non-profit organization, and relies completely on donations and volunteers to operate. Lee Newton founded Winnipeg Harvest in 1984, and the organization opened its doors in 1985.

Harvest has a 10 most-wanted food list that includes canned fish and poultry, baby food and formula, canned vegetables and fruit, canned stew, chili and brown beans, peanut butter, dry pasta, rice, canned spaghetti sauce, cereal and canned soup.

'Women give because they see a need,' says feminist

Lilith founder addresses endowment fund luncheon

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Just five percent of charitable giving in North America goes to support programs for the betterment of women and girls, says Susan Weidman Schneider.

"That's why an organization such as the Women's Endowment Fund of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba is so important," the founder and longtime editor of Lilith, North America's leading Jewish feminist magazine, told the fund's sixth annual luncheon on May 11.

The former Winnipegger was the keynote speaker at this year's luncheon. Her topic was philanthropy and how women approach the subject differently than men do. (Weidman Schneider also spoke at the fund's launch in 1994.)

She began by explaining the difference between charity and philanthropy. The former refers to one-shot giving, such as a fundraising dinner, while the latter she defined as a "habit of giving," she said.

"Women and men approach philanthropy differently," she noted. "Men tend to give because they have been asked by their peers. Women give because they see a need – and they don't need plaques. Women also tend to ask a lot more questions."

Philanthropy, she suggested, is often an alternate route to power for women, and philanthropic women are viewed positively in the community.

"They can't be accused of being too aggressive," she said.

She noted that North American women are earning more money than ever before and are, therefore, giving away more.

"In my mother's generation, society disapproved of women working unless they had to out of absolute need," she said.

As well, she said, family businesses used to be left to sons, but today daughters often receive an equal portion.

"One of our problems is that women are still expected to be modest," Weidman Schneider said. "We spurn honours and recognition. It makes it harder for women to find philanthropic role models."

Jewish women are different from their non-Jewish contemporaries in North America when it comes to attitudes to money and charity, Weidman Schneider said.

She noted that two-thirds of North American Jewish women have university degrees, compared to just 12 per cent of other Caucasian women.

As well, she added, "Jewish women have a more positive attitude to giving, because we have a slightly different history of ownership of money."

That stems from the days when daughters worked in sweatshops and gave their earnings to their parents to supplement the family income.

"They felt the power of holding the purse strings," she said.

She also noted that long ago, Jewish women created free loan societies to help other women who needed a loan for such things as a sewing machine to help support their family or money to pay for medical treatment for a sick child.

Susan Weidman Schneider

Then there were the stock shtetl characters: the yenta, whom Weidman Schneider described as a "wonderful networker who was adept at asking for donations for others," and the balabuste who "could feed 70 people with a quarter of a chicken."

"Jewish women have always had a tradition of giving," she said.

Cal Shell, chair of the endowment fund's grants committee, reported to the audience that last year, the fund was able to donate $27,000 to eight different organizations, including to the Rady Jewish Community Centre for the Canadian premiere of "Lilith Magazine: The Voices of Jewish Women," an exhibit about the impact of feminist Jewish journalism, which runs until mid-June.

"We hope to double the amount of money we can contribute next year," Shell said.

Haredi rabbis from Israel visit Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A historic visit to Montreal by two leading haredi rabbis from Israel went ahead without incident after having been suddenly cancelled out of fear certain chassidic sects would stage a public demonstration against the sages.

Rabbi Aharon Leib Steinman, considered by some as the greatest Torah scholar of his generation, and Rabbi Yaakov Aryeh Alter, leader of the Gur Chassidim, came to Montreal last Wednesday, a day later than originally planned and not at the venue they were scheduled to appear at. The day before, word spread that their visit was off, only to be back on again the day of their arrival.

The rabbis first toured the Yeshiva Gedola Merkaz Hatorah and then went to the nearby Young Israel Synagogue on Hillsdale Road, the hastily arranged new venue, arriving about an hour later than announced. Police cordoned off the short dead-end street and the rabbis arrived in a convoy of vans, sirens sounding.

About 1,000 people waited for them, the men in shul's reception hall and the women in the sanctuary, where they watched the proceedings via closed-circuit video feed.

The rabbis were expected to speak, but Rabbi Steinman gave only a brief brachah, blessing the children present. Symbolically important was the fact that the Vaad Ha'ir's chief rabbi, Avraham Niznik, and his deputy, Rabbi Yonasan Weiss, sat beside them.

Men jostled to take photos of the visitors or just be close to them. Women tried to make out the grainy black-and-white images on the screen. Many left disappointed at not hearing from the rabbis and by the confusion.

Others were simply pleased with what they felt was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity. "Just to know that they came so far for us gives us strength," one woman said.

The rabbis then left for the Belz and Skver chassidic synagogues, also staying only a short time and under police surveillance.

The original plan had been to have them speak at one gathering at a large reception hall in Laval.

The rabbis were on a 10-day North American tour that began in Los Angeles May 14, continued in Toronto, the day before Montreal, and was to conclude in New York. In Toronto, they spoke to a capacity audience at Beth Jacob School.

The two rabbis are both spiritual guides of Israel's United Torah Judaism (UTJ) party, an alliance of two small haredi political parties, one chassidic and the other non-chassidic.

The non-chassidic Rabbi Steinman of Bnei Brak, who is in his 90s, is reviled by extremely anti-Zionist chassidim because of accommodations he has made over the years with the State of Israel. Tensions are especially high at the moment because Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is in coalition talks with UTJ.

A particular point of contention between the anti-Zionists and Rabbi Steinman is his purported support for the creation of a special haredi unit within the Israel Defence Forces upon the expiration next year of the law allowing yeshiva students to indefinitely defer military service. (On May 17, while the rabbis were abroad, Olmert promised the UTJ that if it joins the coalition the 1948 Tal Law would be extended for five years.)

Some Israeli media reported that local Satmar chassidim had obtained a police permit to stage a protest in Montreal that was being instigated by one of its two leading rabbis, Moshe Tyrnauer.

Alex Werzberger, a spokesperson for the community, firmly denied the report.

"This is a figment of somebody's imagination," he said.

He thinks a protest may have been planned by the Neturei Karta faction, based in Monsey, N.Y., as was also reported, possibly with the participation of the small group of Tasher chassidim in Boisbriand, Que.

Werzberger distanced Satmar from the Neturei Karta, which campaigns actively for the dismantling of the State of Israel, as "vociferous."

He said that it's true that Rabbi Tyrnauer referred obliquely, without mentioning names, to the rabbis' impending visit in a Shabbat sermon, but he merely advised the community to stay away from the event. Anonymous flyers later circulated in the neighbourhood, urging a boycott.

"It was an uncharacteristically mild speech for Rabbi Tyrnauer, who I would call a militant," said Werzberger, who is also president of the Coalition of Chassidic Organizations of Outremont.

Werzberger said the Satmar have a serious disagreement with the visiting rabbis because they are "pushing Orthodox kids to go into the army," but most don't think that Orthodox Jews protesting against rabbis in the streets is the right way to express that.

Montreal has one of the world's largest Satmar communities, with about 300 families.

Rabbi Steinman, and possibly Rabbi Alter as well, were slated to spend Shabbat in Monsey, despite reports the Neturei Karta would demonstrate there.

Becel cycling fundraiser planned for June 4

Millions of Canadians are at risk for developing heart disease and stroke – and some much too early in their lives. Just ask Sheila Corman, Richard Pettit and Beth Gibson.

They know the importance of raising funds for research into heart disease and stroke. One of the most popular ways is the Heart and Stroke Foundation's annual Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart, the foundation's largest cycling fundraiser. This year, it takes place on June 4 in Toronto.

Corman, now 45, had a heart attack when she was 42. Pettit, who has just turned 56, had triple bypass surgery last year. And Gibson, 46, has a family history of stroke – her mother, grandmother and great-grandmother all died of strokes.

Mayor David Miller has proclaimed June 4 Becel Ride for Heart Day. That day, more than 13,000 eager cyclists and in-line skaters, including Corman, Pettit and Gibson, will participate in the ride.

This show of support will help the foundation continue to lead the way toward a greater understanding of the causes of heart disease and stroke. The fundraising goal for Toronto this year is $2 million.

The 19th annual Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart begins at the west gates of Exhibition Place, and cyclists will pedal along the Gardiner Expressway and up the Don Valley Parkway – the world's longest bike path.

The event starts at 8 a.m., and cyclists can take the 25-, 50- or 75-kilometre route, while in-line skaters can complete a five-, 10- or 20-kilometre route.

For more information, or to register, call the RIDEline at 416-486-RIDE (7433) or visit the website at www.heartandstroke.ca/rideforheart.

Media shines light on Mubarak's heavy hand

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Canadian media are giving increasing coverage to developments in the Middle East that are unconnected to Arab-Israeli relations.

The West, along with many Arabs themselves, is concerned with the tension between democratization versus Islamization in Arab societies, and its ripple effects abroad.

U.S. President George Bush has been trying to shake up an Arab world mired in corrupt, inertia-ridden authoritarianism by pushing for democratic reform in Afghanistan, Iraq and elsewhere in the region. The very mixed results have had adverse repercussions.

For instance, the election of the radical Islamic Hamas as the PA government in the West Bank and Gaza in March had a chilling effect on supporters of liberal democracy. To their disappointment, religious fundamentalists bent on destroying prospects for substantial democratic reform came out ahead.

As a result, the West has been placed on the proverbial horns of a dilemma. It must support democracy in principle, but not necessarily always in practice. As a prime example, the United States has remained mostly silent as Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak's authoritarianism has grown.

Mubarak fears that an open democratic process might weaken his grip on power and allow, among other things, the rise of the theocratic Muslim Brotherhood. (Though the Brotherhood is officially banned as a party in Egypt, individual members ran in last year's elections – elections widely seen as manipulated by Mubarak.) The broader issue is that the Bush administration is reportedly concerned that a strong push for open elections in Egypt could unleash the counter-productive forces of Islamic extremism.

Hosni Mubarak

Most recently, considerable media attention on Egypt has focused not only the April 24 terrorist attacks in the Red Sea resort of Dahab and continuing Islamist threats, but also on clashes in the streets of Cairo between pro-democracy activists and government forces intent on maintaining firm control.

In "Judiciary leading protests against election fraud" (National Post, May 10) Peter Goodspeed examined the struggle between pro-democracy forces, including some elements of the judiciary, and Mubarak's government as it tries to clamp down on them.

Goodspeed opened his report as follows: "Egypt's brief taste of an 'Arab Spring' is over. Last year's promise of free presidential and parliamentary elections, political reform and openness have been crushed by a new campaign of repression that seeks to silence nearly all anti-government protest."

Goodspeed described a country where a 25-year-old state of emergency has just been renewed, where thousands of armed riot police patrol Cairo in an ever-present show of force, where large numbers of pro-democracy activists have been jailed, and most famously, where Ayman Nour, who challenged Mubarak himself in the country's first multi-candidate presidential elections last year, was subsequently sentenced to a five-year prison term. Human rights groups maintain the charges of election fraud against Nour were completely trumped up.

Mubarak's ruling National Democratic Party won 70 per cent of the parliamentary seats. Two of Egypt's top judges suffered government harassment after they complained about the possibility of election fraud. A good number of the country's judges have supported them to protest governmental interference.

* * *

For the record: While Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas continues to urge Hamas to renounce violence, recognize Israel and respect signed peace agreements, PA Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh (considered by some in the West to belong to the moderate, more pragmatic wing of Hamas) told Palestinians in Gaza marking the May 14 anniversary of the "Naqba," the "catastrophe" of Israel's founding, that Hamas will not waver at all from its rejection of Israel. "I swear to God we will not make concessions" he promised his audience. Hanyieh's words should answer those who keep insisting that Hamas can be encouraged to be moderate.

Perhaps the most sobering observation about why Hamas cannot genuinely moderate itself came from Eyad Sarraj, a well-known Gaza-based Palestinian psychiatrist and peace activist. According to Steven Erlanger (New York Times, May 11), Sarraj has appealed to Hamas leaders to "recognize the idea of a permanent Israel" even though he recognizes the futility of his efforts. As he told Erlanger: "But for Hamas [rejecting Israel] is metaphysics, not politics – it's ideology, that all of Palestine is Islamic land."

The battle of the pareve desserts

By KIM PEKOFSKY KUSHNER
Special to The CJN

Shavuot is my mother-in-law's favourite holiday. She looks forward to it all year long, not only because of its meaning, the Jewish people's acceptance of the Torah from Moses on Mount Sinai, but rather because she claims, "It's the only holiday when I can finally serve some decent dessert."

Of course, my mother-in-law is referring to the tradition of serving dairy foods on Shavuot. And, of course, as you've certainly come to realize, my mother-in-law is one of those people who argues with 100 per cent certainty that no pareve dessert can ever come close to tasting as good as a dairy dessert.

Well, she is not alone in her thoughts. Many people get excited around Shavuot because they look forward to baking that mouth-watering cheesecake recipe that they've been dying to try, or that real ice-cream cake that looks so divine.

Well, dairy desserts are good – I won't deny that. Still, I'd like to prove my mother-in-law wrong, because I truly believe that pareve desserts can be just as good as dairy desserts. Over the last little while, I have experimented quite a bit in this area, and have uncovered three key techniques for converting almost any dairy dessert into an equally as delicious pareve one.

• Substitute for butter. Sure, we all use margarine in place of butter to convert the recipe to pareve, but in order for the margarine's consistency to work like butter, the margarine must be frozen. Simply replacing one stick of butter with one stick of margarine won't cut it. Keep several sticks of margarine in your freezer at all times, and when a recipe calls for butter, replace it with chunks of frozen margarine. This will surely do the trick. Your crusts will be flakier, your dough will be firmer and easier to work with, and your fillings delectably smoother and tastier. Trust me.

• Substitute for milk. Non-dairy creamers or soy milk are only partially the right answers. Yes, they will work, but once again, the key lies in the texture of these liquids. If you slightly heat your creamer, the liquid will thicken enough to allow for a creamier taste and texture. But don't overheat the creamer – 20 seconds in the microwave usually does the trick!

• Substitute for sour cream or yogurt: Replace each cup of sour cream or yogurt with one cup of chilled non-dairy whipped cream plus 1 tbsp. of freshly squeezed lemon juice. It works!

Don't forget that some pareve desserts speak for themselves, without needing any substitutions – a pavlova or a sponge cake – how can you ever go wrong? There is a reason that some pareve desserts have been around forever!

TRIPLE CHOCOLATE-RASPBERRY PAVLOVA

Chocolate meringue:
7 egg whites, room temperature
1 cup granulated sugar
3 tbsp. cocoa powder, sifted
1 cup pareve semi-sweet chocolate chips, melted and cooled
1 tsp. balsamic vinegar

Topping:
2 cups pareve whipping cream
1 pint raspberries
4 tbsp. shaved pareve baking chocolate

Preheat the oven to 350. Line a large baking sheet with parchment paper and set aside. Beat the egg whites with an electric mixer until soft peaks form, and then beat in the sugar, one spoonful at a time, until the meringue is stiff and satiny. Gently fold in the cocoa powder, the melted chocolate and the vinegar until well incorporated.

Pour the meringue onto the prepared baking sheet, and using a spatula, form a disk approximately 9 inches in diameter. Place the meringue disk in the oven and immediately reduce the temperature to 300. Bake for 1 hour to 1 hour and 15 minutes, until crisp around edges, but soft inside. Turn off the oven and leave the meringue in the oven for an additional 30 minutes. Remove from oven and cool completely.

When ready to serve, gently invert the meringue disk onto a large plate, peel off the parchment paper (meringue may be slightly cracked – this is fine). Whip the cream until stiff peaks form and dollop it into the centre of the meringue disk, leaving a 1-inch margin. Scatter the raspberries over the whipped cream and sprinkle with the shaved chocolate. Refrigerate until ready to serve.

Note: Meringue base can be prepared 1 day in advance. Pavlova can be assembled and refrigerated up to 3 hours in advance. Serves 8 to 10.

A chocolate soufflé as seen in Fast Healthy Food, Readers Digest publishers

CHOCOLATE SOUFFLES

1½ cups pareve semi-sweet chocolate chips
1¼ sticks frozen margarine
3 eggs
3 egg yolks
1¼ cup powdered sugar
⅓ cup all purpose flour
6 ceramic ramekin dishes
soft margarine for greasing

Preheat oven to 450. Grease 6 ramekins with soft butter and set aside. Bring a pot of water to a gentle boil and place a glass bowl over the pot of boiling water. Place chocolate chips and margarine in the bowl and melt it slowly over the boiling water, stirring constantly. Once both the chocolate and the margarine are melted, remove from heat, and let cool slightly.

In a large bowl, using a whisk, beat together the eggs and the yolks. Whisk in the powdered sugar, then add the chocolate mixture and the flour. Mix well to ensure all the ingredients are combined. This can be made up to one day in advance, covered with plastic wrap and refrigerated until you are ready to bake.

Pour the batter into the ramekins, filling them part way, and place the ramekins on a baking sheet.

Bake the cakes for 11-13 minutes, until sides are set, but centre remains soft. Let cool for 2 minutes. Serve in the ramekins or run a knife around each cake to loosen and immediately turn out onto a plate. Be careful, ramekins will be extremely hot! Serve with sorbet or pareve ice-cream. Makes 6 individual souffles.

Bush won't set a timetable for Israeli withdrawal

By NATHAN GUTTMAN
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — U.S. President George W. Bush will ask Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert if his plan to unilaterally set Israel's borders is compatible with the idea of a two-state solution when the two leaders meet this week.

According to a senior Bush official, Bush will expect Olmert to explain how a unilateral move could be compatible with his administration's wish for a negotiated final status agreement.

The official told the Jerusalem Post that Bush will not express his opinion on the plan at this stage. "We need answers before the president can make a decision. There will be no decisions made at this meeting," the official emphasized.

The U.S. administration believes there is sufficient time to pursue both the idea of direct talks on a final status agreement and the unilateral withdrawal plan, since no settlement would be removed before the end of 2007 or the middle of 2008. According to the official, it would still be possible to go ahead with negotiations if there was a political change in the Palestinian Authority by the time Israel is ready to implement the plan.

Although "there is no timetable and no fixed date," the official said, "Olmert has limited time in office" and wanted to implement his plan while Bush is still in the White House. Even so, the United States would not set a deadline for Olmert to implement his plan.

Though it doesn't support PA President Mahmoud Abbas' request for entering final status discussions, the Bush administration expects Israel to speak to Abbas on issues of humanitarian assistance, border crossings and tax revenue.

Bush and cabinet members will present several questions regarding Olmert's plan for unilateral withdrawal plan in a series of meetings to be held in Washington this week. The questions will deal with issues of IDF forces that may remain to the west of the fence, negotiations with Jordan on border issues, protection of the holy sites in the West Bank after Israel withdraws, and the legal status of the new border. The administration official estimated there were at least two-dozen unanswered questions about Olmert's plan.

[File photo]

George W. Bush

"The Gaza disengagement was easy, because the borders were clear and there were no Israelis left there," the official said, adding that a plan for unilateral withdrawal from the West Bank is "extremely complicated."

The official stressed that the U.S. view is that most of the settlements in the West Bank "need to go," though he added that the administration remained committed to the statement in Bush's letter to former prime minister Ariel Sharon, in which Bush spoke of the reality on the ground created by major Jewish settlement blocs.

Bush was also expected to raise the issue of sending assistance to the Palestinian Authority without allowing aid to go through the Hamas-led government. The administration still believes that pressure on Hamas is building, and that this pressure might bring about a change in Hamas' policies. According to the senior official, the administration believes Hamas is trying to keep terror at a low level while not doing anything to eliminate it.

In related developments, Olmert said last week in a private meeting that his "convergence" plan for a major West Bank withdrawal will involve the removal of fewer than 70,000 settlers, the figure most widely quoted in the media. Other sources in Kadima, meanwhile, now say that the eventual number of settlers to be evacuated will be much lower than 70,000.

The total number of Israelis living in settlements to the east of the separation fence is some 70,000. This has therefore been widely assumed to be the number slated for withdrawal, since the plan presented by Olmert before the election included moving the settlers from areas beyond the fence into "settlement blocs" within the fence.

But Kadima members involved in the ongoing talks between Olmert and the settlers now say 70,000 is "a media invention and the actual number will be much lower."

Former settler leaders Rabbi Yoel Bin-Nun and MK Otniel Schneller, who joined Kadima before the elections, are studying ways to keep as many settlements as possible within the fence or subject to alternative security arrangements. Olmert does not intend to refer to a number in public so as not to be pinned down by a commitment.

Members of Kadima involved in the talks are also claiming that the estimated price tag for convergence is much lower than the NIS 80 billion sum commonly mentioned, which is 10 times what Gaza pullout cost. The lower estimate, they said, is not solely because of the smaller-than-anticipated number of settlers to be evacuated, but also because a different range of compensations was needed for Gaza settlements, which included a large number of farms and other agricultural assets. There is little agriculture in the areas slated for withdrawal in the West Bank.

The West Bank pullout is planned to take place over a much longer time frame than the Gaza withdrawal and its cost will therefore be spread over four years, instead of coming from one year's budget, as was the case with Gaza.

The settlers who were evacuated from Gaza were moved to hotels or temporary housing. Under the West Bank plan, the intention is to avoid such costs by building permanent houses before the settlers are removed.

Schneller is also hoping that at least some of the settlements will be moved by agreement, saving the costs of mobilizing thousands of soldiers and police officers to enforce evacuation.

Rocket fire turns Israel's southern coast into war zone

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

ASHKELON, Israel – The boom of artillery fire along Israel's southern coast provides an incongruous backdrop to the bikini-clad girls, scruffy fishermen and ice cream stands just upwind of these sandy Mediterranean beaches, in the city of Ashkelon.

But with a Hamas-run quasi-state next door in Gaza, constant rocket fire in the direction of Israeli communities and daily attempts by Palestinians to infiltrate into Israel, this new frontier – occasioned by Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip last summer – has become the site of a massive Israeli military buildup.

The Israel Defense Forces is beefing up positions atop sand dunes all along the coast here, fortifying lookouts, increasing patrols and, lately, firing almost non-stop artillery barrages into the Gaza Strip.

"This border is not cooling off," says Eli Toledano, vice platoon commander at an IDF base just east of Gaza. "I would not call it a stable situation."

Hardly a night passes where the IDF does not catch Palestinians trying to infiltrate Israel through the Gaza border fence, hit IDF patrols with gunfire and rocket-propelled grenades or bomb IDF patrols.

But the most irksome – and deadly – Palestinian action so far has been the firing of rockets at Israeli towns near Gaza.

More than a dozen civilians, including several Palestinians, have been killed in the past two years from rocket fire. Militants have stepped up their attacks since Israel withdrew from the Gaza Strip last summer.

Most of the rocket fire nowadays is aimed at Ashkelon, the closest Israeli city to Gaza, about eight miles away. No rockets have reached Ashkelon yet – but some have fallen in the industrial zone just south of the city, where a major power station, desalination plant, oil refinery and more than 60 other factories are located.

Anat Wienstein-Berkovits, a spokesperson for Ashkelon's mayor, says the rockets are terrorizing the 5,000-plus people who work in the industrial zone.

"It's not the damage that a Qassam causes," she says. "If a Qassam falls onto a sand dune or a road and doesn't cause any damage, the workers there still live in fear that one day they will fall in a place where it will cause damage."

"It's really terror," Wienstein-Berkovits says. "It's just like the threat of a suicide bomber."

This week Palestinians fired a Katyusha rocket toward Ashkelon. It was the second time in recent months that a Katyusha, which has a range of up to 15 miles, has been fired from Gaza. It landed in a chicken coop in the Israeli town of Netiv Ha'asara, killing some 30 chickens.

The Israeli army responds to the rocket fire with heavy artillery barrages, which the IDF says helps deter Palestinians from firing more rockets.

"Terrorist organizations need to understand that Qassam fire is not worthwhile," says Tal Lev-Ram, spokesperson for the IDF's Southern Command. "But they are still not convinced and they continue to fire. And our response will continue to be harsh and to exact a heavy price."

Most days, the IDF fires hundreds of shells into Gaza. They come from artillery batteries to Gaza's east and north, from navy vessels patrolling the Mediterranean west of Gaza and sometimes from Israeli helicopters crisscrossing the sky above.

The IDF says the idea is not so much to hit the terrorists firing rockets – artillery fire is not accurate enough for that – but to make it difficult for terrorists to safely launch their rockets, and to deter rocket fire through the unpleasantness of the constant shelling.

The IDF says the strategy has reduced the frequency of rocket attacks and ultimately will help bring quiet, without the need for an incursion into Gaza.

"If there won't be quiet on our side, there won't be quiet on their side," Lev-Ram vows.

Two weeks ago, Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh reportedly warned senior Islamic Jihad officials that their rocket fire was harming Palestinian interests by provoking the Israeli artillery barrages.

Some of those barrages have killed Palestinian civilians.

But Israelis who live in the region say the near-constant refrain of artillery is more troublesome than the Qassams themselves. On one recent day, Israel fired more than 1,200 shells into Gaza.

The artillery fire "has become very troublesome," Ashkelon's mayor, Roni Mehatzri, told JTA. "We demanded that the IDF do everything possible to halt the fire. The noise of the firing of the artillery is simply terrible. It really is harmful. Citizens are afraid of it."

"We can't live like this," he adds.

The IDF says its goal is to protect the residents of southern Israel while disrupting life as little as possible.

That means that IDF jeep patrols share the road with tractors and farm vehicles; weekend cyclists may find their picnics interrupted by the roar of an armoured personnel carrier nearby; and residents have had to adjust to the artillery refrain.

Residents say they've learned to distinguish between the whoosh-whistle of the Qassam rockets, which leave a trail of white-gray smoke, and the booming of the artillery, which is more steady, shakes the windows of houses and frightens dogs.

Israel Briefs

Peace seen unlikely

Almost two out of three Israelis and Palestinians don't anticipate a peace accord in the near future, a survey found. According to polls commissioned by the grassroots group One Voice and released last week, 65 per cent of Israelis and Palestinians believe peace will not be possible within the next four years. Asked if they could have a personal impact on the conflict, 73 per cent of Israelis and 45 per cent of Palestinians said no. On both sides, approximately 45 per cent believe the media give more and perhaps too much attention to extremist voices. "The numbers reflect the growing desensitization among both peoples, after seeing a bloody past and living a shaky present," One Voice founder and president Daniel Lubetzky said in a statement. "What we need is to focus them on a concrete future where they can play a role in taking their lives back."

PA arms funding disclosed

Millions of dollars in foreign aid to the Palestinian Authority was used to buy weapons, Israel's Shin Bet security agency says. The Shin Bet released a transcript of its interrogations of Fuad Shobaki, a former PA financier and confidant of former PA president Yasser Arafat who was jailed in the West Bank city of Jericho until Israeli troops took him into custody in May. Shobaki was quoted as saying that Arafat ordered the mass procurement of weapons when the intifadah began in 2000. This included the purchase of arms from Iran, some of which were sent to Gaza on the Karine-A ship in 2002, only to be intercepted by Israeli naval commandos. Shobaki was also quoted as saying that Arafat passed weapons to the Al-Aqsa Brigades terror group via activists in his Fatah faction.

France warns Israel

France warned Israel against setting its border unilaterally in the West Bank. On a visit to Israel, French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said Israel should restart negotiations with the Palestinian Authority toward a peace accord. "Unilateralism will not allow either side to achieve its goals," he told reporters. "It is inconceivable that an international border would be set unilaterally." Douste-Blazy's Israeli counterpart, Tzipi Livni, said Israel would prefer to reach a negotiated deal if possible.

Economy beats forecast

Israel's economy beat first-quarter forecasts. The country's GDP rose 6.6 per cent, the Central Bureau of Statistics reported last week. Most of the increase was caused by a 76 per cent jump in new car purchases. Israel's trade balance also improved, with a 5.2 per cent drop in imports and a 2.4 per cent rise in exports.

Israel joins UN body

Israel was appointed to a spot on the United Nations committee on non-governmental organizations. The committee of the UN Economic and Social Council meets twice annually and reviews applications for special status with the commission. "Maybe our membership in the committee will help make Israeli NGOs more aware of this avenue and encourage them to seek a relationship with the economic and social council," said Marco Sermoneta, a counselor at Israel's UN mission. As well, he said, membership would be a "good way to diversify our visibility in the United Nations." A handful of Israeli NGOs already have special consultative status with ECOSOC, including, most recently, the Israel Women's Network, which was recommended for the status last week.

Jewish groups mobilize against call for boycott

By CHANAN TIGAY
JTA

NEW YORK — Jewish groups are mobilizing to defeat another potential boycott of Israeli academics, this time by Britain's largest union for college teachers.

The 65,000-member National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education (NATFHE) will meet May 27 to 29. Barring procedural stumbling blocks, the association will vote on an emergency motion to blacklist Israeli lecturers and academic institutions that don't publicly declare their opposition to Israel's presence in the West Bank.

The motion accuses Israel of "apartheid policies" and asks NATFHE members to boycott Israeli educational institutions and individuals who don't publicly distance themselves from Israeli policy.

The move comes a year after another British union, the Association of University Teachers (AUT), passed a similar Israeli boycott. It later rescinded the decision in the face of international criticism.

> 'Once again, a group of British academics is targeting Israel'

"Once again, a group of British academics is targeting Israel, only this time, their goals are even more insidious," said Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League. "Members of this union are being told that it's acceptable to boycott Israeli scholars on the basis of their nationality and to question them about their political views. By singling out Israel, these activists are once again demonstrating the anti-Semitic agenda which lies at the heart of the boycott movement."

NATFHE Resolution 198C, a copy of which was obtained by JTA, cites "continuing Israeli apartheid policies, including construction of the exclusion wall and discriminatory educational practices. It recalls its motion of solidarity last year for the AUT resolution to exercise moral and professional responsibility."

The resolution further "invites members to consider their own responsibility for ensuring equity and non-discrimination in contacts with Israeli educational institutions or individuals and to consider the appropriateness of a boycott of those that do not publicly dissociate themselves from such policies."

It is one of two resolutions relating to Israel. The other asks British academics to support Palestinian colleagues in the face of "the continual attacks by Israel's government" and to reaffirm that support by contacting the Palestinian Authority government. The United States and the European Union have cut off contact with the Palestinian Authority now that it is run by the terrorist group Hamas.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of Canada-Israel Committee, said NATFHE tried the same thing about 18 months ago when it tried to boycott University of Haifa and Bar-Ilan University academics.

"Their decision was overwhelmingly reversed after there was a substantial outcry in the United Kingdom and internationally.

"This is simply a second effort to flog the issue again. [This group] is determined to delegitimize Israel, but there is growing impatience at every level for the kind of efforts that don't advance peace and constructive understanding," Fogel said.

Meanwhile, the American Jewish Committee has reinstated its anti-boycott fund, launched last year to help combat the AUT resolution. The group last week pledged an additional $10,000 to the fund.

"The track record from the experience with the AUT showed that a variety of tools need to be used to combat this type of boycott, and one of them is that people have the ability to sue or at least assert their legal rights," said Kenneth Stern, a specialist on anti-Semitism and extremism at the AJCommittee. "We're raising funds to help whoever is impacted by this to fight it in any way possible. They shouldn't have to bear the cost."

The teachers association, which is planning a summer merger with the AUT, won't comment on the motion "unless and until it is certain that it will be discussed at the conference."

"It's an emergency motion," NATFHE spokesperson Trevor Phillips told JTA. "Not all emergency motions are discussed. This one is in some doubt because of procedural issues."

The American Jewish Congress has made it possible for those who oppose the boycott to automatically generate e-mail letters to NATFHE and AUT leaders. So far, 1,500 e-mails have been sent.

"NATFHE's proposed resolutions are indefensible," said Congress executive director, Neil Goldstein.

"One resolution advocates support of the Palestinian government run by Hamas, an internationally recognized terrorist organization that proudly takes credit for the murder of innocent Israeli civilians. This support of terrorism reveals the one-sided political nature of the NATFHE resolutions and the moral blindness of its statements on the tragic Middle East conflict."

In Britain, efforts are underway among some anti-boycott members of NATFHE to lobby against the motion, a model based on the effort that overturned last year's AUT measure.

"The important grassroots work has to be done by people who are members of the union," said Jon Benjamin, chief executive of the Board of Deputies of British Jews. "We are certainly keeping a close eye on what's going on and providing whatever assistance we can in terms of logistical help.

"It's like a bush fire," he added. "You think you've put it out and then it pops up somewhere else. It's going to be a constant thing."

The World Jewish Congress and other groups were very upset by the NATFHE motion.

"Any boycott call that is based on whether Israeli academics support their government's policy is like the AUT call last year – discriminatory and effectively an anti-Semitic act," Ronnie Fraser of Academic Friends of Israel said in a letter posted on the Bar-Ilan University website. Bar-Ilan was one of two Israeli universities specifically targeted by last year's resolution, while this year's NATFHE motion would affect all Israeli academic institutions.

Meanwhile, Scholars for Peace in the Middle East launched an online petition to oppose the resolution.

"Academic boycott actions are antithetical, not only to the principles of academic freedom, but also to the quest for peaceful resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict," the petition said. "Those who perpetuate and participate in such boycotts are separating themselves from the academic community as opposed to bringing it together to work for peace and support academic freedom."

Letters to NATFHE and AUT can be sent through http://www.ajcongress.org/Action-Alert.asp

The Scholars for Peace in the Middle East petition is available at http://www.spme.net/cgi-bin/display_petitions.cgi?ID=2.

Israel & the Jewish World

Syrians won't release Eli Cohen's remains

Their parents hail from well-known Syrian Jewish families: on his mother's side, the Tawil family, on his father's the Gindi and Cohen families.

Writing in Moment magazine, Maurice described their early years in Alexandria as difficult.

"As Jews, we were double outcasts," he stated. "Egyptian Muslims were growing increasingly hostile toward Jews and the British, who ruled Egypt until 1954, did nothing to temper the discrimination. From our earliest childhood, we knew we were interlopers in Egypt and longed to create a place where we could truly belong."

Both brothers became ardent Zionists, with Eli joining the Zionist underground. While at university, studying electrical engineering, Eli and other Jews were continually persecuted by the Muslim Brotherhood, a forerunner to today's Islamic extremists.

Eli joined the Haganah underground and after the creation of the State of Israel, he remained in Egypt, where he was implicated in the Lavon Affair, an attempt by Israeli intelligence to sabotage relations between Egypt and the United States and Britain. Although questioned by Egyptian police, he was released. He eventually made his way to Israel and for several years, worked an an accountant and inspector for a chain of retail stores.

In 1959, he married Nadia Magled, and they soon had their first child, a daughter, Sophie.

Cohen was recruited by army intelligence and later was transferred to the Mossad. He was dispatched to Argentina, where he established his cover as Kamel Amin Sa'bet, a wealthy merchant of Syrian descent. He established good relations with the local Arab community and with expatriate Arabs. One was the Syrian military attaché, Amin el Hafiz, who would later become the country's president.

When he later moved to Syria, he became a confidant of the president and was able to obtain key intelligence about Syrian economic and military policy, Maurice said.

Maurice, for his part, was also recruited by Mossad and was given the job of cryptographer. During his tour of duty, he came across information provided by their man in Damascus, at first not realizing it originated with his brother. As far as the Cohen family knew, Eli was working for the Israeli government in Europe, purchasing spare computer parts and electronic equipment to be used for military purposes.

In Damascus, Eli circulated among the highest echelons of Syrian society. He was invited to attend the national convention of the ruling Ba'ath Party and he learned of Syria's plans to cut off Israeli water supply by diverting the headwaters of the Jordan River. Using information provided by Cohen, the Israeli Defence Forces bombed Syrian positions and put an end to the plan.

Syrian intelligence got wind of Cohen's espionage and he was arrested and tortured prior to his execution.

In 1968, three Israelis with ties to various intelligence branches attempted to smuggle Cohen's remains out of the country, but they were caught near the Lebanese border. In the mid-1970s, Israel captured several Syrian generals on the frontier and its offer to trade them for Cohen's remains was again turned down, Maurice said.

In the intervening years, Maurice Cohen sent a personal appeal to then Syrian president Hafez Assad through the president's British biographer, journalist Patrick Seale. In his letter to the Syrian leader, Cohen noted the pain Assad must have felt over the loss of his son in a car accident and the need to bury him properly.

Assad responded through an intermediary, saying Eli's remains would be returned "in good time," Cohen recounted, which he took to mean when the messiah arrives.

When Bashir Assad took over as Syrian president after his father's death, "we thought the son, educated as an eye doctor in London, would be more open. But because the government is done by ministers of his father and he's a puppet, he is too weak to send the remains," Cohen said.

Today, Cohen is hoping to gather 100,000 signatures on an online petition (www.elicohen.org) to be presented to Bashir Assad asking for the return of Cohen's remains. The number currently stands at upwards of 50,000.

He is also spearheading an effort to build a community centre in Ramat Gan in his brother's honour. An American support group – American Friends of the Eli Cohen Memorial, Inc. – has been established to raise funds.

Eli's widow, Nadia, who Maurice implored in his last letter to remarry but who has not, has also written an open letter to Bashir Assad, congratulating him on assuming the presidency and asking for the return to Israel of her husband's remains as a gesture of more harmonious relations between the two countries. She was turned down.

Maurice, who is now very ill and is being fed through a tube, said that for years "I have all the hope and I will do it [repatriate the body] in my life.

"I don't know how much I have to live. I suffered so much for that."

BEAUTY SHOP

By STACEY MICHAELS AND FRANCINE BIRKEN

Dedicated in memory of Carol Wise.

Beauty Shop is pleased to announce the addition of Francine Birken, a makeup artist with 25 years of experience. Over the years, she has applied makeup to hundreds of faces for all occasions.

Beauty News: As we approach the hot weather, the excitement we begin to feel brings a natural glow to all of our faces. Pamper yourself with the wonderful products we are about to share with you.

STACEY'S TIPS

SPA AND SKIN CARE: The essence of natural beauty lies in the care of your complexion, not in the makeup you cover it with. If you have fresh-looking, healthy skin, makeup can be simple and easy to apply. Sunscreen is recommended year round, most importantly in the summer, to protect the layers of skin. Use a minimum SPF15 on your face and body.

Chanel introduces Rectifiance Intense Eye retexturizing line-correcting eye cream. This innovative cream smoothes lines and wrinkles around the eye area and begins correcting years of sun damage.

Lancome Laboratories has a new at-home Microdermabrasion system - Resurface-C Microdermabrasion Skin Polishing and Radiance Renewing System. This unique two-step system combines the benefits of an effective microdermabrasion treatment with the radiance-boosting and skin-texture improving ingredient, vitamin C.

Research has shown that calcium – when it is applied topically to the skin – helps to restore strength and density to mature, thin skin. Now, after a decade of intensive research, Lancome Laboratories unveils a skincare breakthrough – Platinéum Hydroxy (a)-Calcium. Try it today!

Lise Watier launches Lift and Firm, a day cream that provides a complete anti-aging lifting action. Formulated with the youth profiler complex, exclusive to Lise Watier, Lift and Firm provides skin with a new youthful sensation, firmness and tightness in an instant.

Eau de Toilette Delices de Cartier.

NeoStrata unveils Total Radiance Vitamin C Concentrate, which delivers the proven rejuvenating benefits of L-ascorbic acid to your skin. Its exclusive triple-action formula boosts skin clarity and enhances its elasticity, helping maintain a youthful complexion.

Vichy Laboratoires offers the new Lipocure Anti-Dimpling Decongesting Serum, a 14-day shock treatment that unlocks and visibly smoothes stubborn cellulite and dimpled areas on the thighs, buttocks and hips by 20 per cent. The serum works to stimulate the elimination of fatty deposits.

Freeze 24-7 launches Skin Glacé, a daily detoxifying cleanser and mask that provides deep cleansing for maximum skin purification, detoxification and hydration. This ultra-rich, soothing cleanser and mask is perfect for all skin types.

Caryl Baker Visage has a new, innovative At-Home Microdermabrasion System that has been developed to provide healing and regenerative exfoliation and contains a Prep Treatment and a Microdermabrasion Mineral Crystal Treatment. Both products work together for maximum results to enhance the skin's natural beauty.

New at Marcelle is Hydra-C ComplexE 24H Moisturizing Gel-Cream and Hydra-C ComplexE 24H Hydrating Fluid. Both products feature a combination of the latest technological ingredients to keep skin hydrated and radiant throughout the day.

Spalina, a luxury footcare line, is new from Airplus for Her. The line includes five items for a complete foot beauty regimen: Pedistone – a double-sided pumice stone; Scrub – an exfoliant sugar scrub; Repair – a restorative heavy cream for cracked heels; Heal – super-hydrating heel cream; and a Spa Therapy Sock – an ultra-comfortable therapy sock. Don't miss these luxury products!

Boss Skin is the new male high-performance skin care line from the house of Boss by Hugo Boss. Boss Skin is made up of seven products, grouped under four simple categories: Clean – refreshing face wash and smoothing face scrub; Shave – performance shave gel and relaxing aftershave balm; Moisturise – instant moisture gel; and Specialty – perfecting skin serum and reviving eye gel.

Airplus For Her foot products

Glamour Safari Eye Shadow Quartet.

FRANCINE'S TIPS

FOUNDATION: Choose a foundation shade that matches your tanned skin. Test the colour by applying it to the jaw and then blend into the neck area. Make sure to blend well over the entire face. If you are not one who bakes in the sun, choose a bronzing shimmer powder to give you that beautiful suntan look.

Marcelle introduces the Sheer Tint Fluid Moisturizer SPF15, which protects and evens out skin tones all in one step. The summer must-haves also include Marcelle Bronzing Pressed Powder Duo, which is offered in two shades of bronze to suit all skin tones. Its ultra-fine texture covers the skin with a soft tone of bronze and glistens with a rich gold shimmer.

Lancome has created a self-tanning gel for the body that protects against rub-off on clothes. Flash Bronzer Glow 'N Wear is a bronzer that dries in less than five minutes and shows a medium-glow tan in less than one hour.

EYES: Eyes are the focal point of the face. Choose eye shadow colours that will suit the shape and colour of your eyes. Be sure to apply a beige highlighter on the brow bone, colour on the eyelid, and a darker colour on the corner to add depth. This summer, colours explore a wide range of greens, yellow/beiges and intense hues of violet, orange and gold.

Lise Watier again delivers the beauty goodies with Glamour Safari Eye Shadow Quarter. It is packaged in a luxurious compact with a giraffe print. The colours are exotic, mysterious and intense and take care of all your needs. As a wonderful compliment to these outstanding shadows, Lise Watier introduces Eye Shine Jungle, a deep green eye liner with a hint of gold.

Tom Ford Estee Lauder Collection comes alive with The Eye Duo to complement varying skin tones. Azuree offers an understated selection of peach tones, Cap Bronzee comes in warm hues of sand and St. Tropee features exotic shades of mauves.

Lancome has created a high-tech case – round, fun, trendy and convenient eye shadow compact. Colour Design comes in 38 shades and five finishes: metallic, intense, shimmer, sheen and matte. Women can create various looks and become proficient in the blink of an eye.

BEAUTY SHOP

By Stacey Michaels and Francine Birken

BLUSH: Gel and liquid blush are best to make the cheeks rosy. MAC See Thru Cheek Colour is a gel cheek stain that provides see-through translucent coverage. It is applied with a sponge tip applicator. This gel is a non-streaking, long-wearing, waterproof product. A must to try on hot summer days. When using a powder blush, be sure to clean brushes often to avoid any type of bacteria that can be transferred to the skin.

Sweetie Cake beauty products by MAC

LIPS: During the summer months, lips can get dry and burnt. Make sure to use a lip balm if exposed to the sun. Most lip products today contain a sunscreen of an SPF15 or higher. Use this daily to keep those lips in luscious condition. This summer, lip colours are vibrant red, pale pink and shades of orange.

Lise Watier adds three new inviting shades to its delicious Rouge Gourmand collection of lipsticks: Baie Sauvage, an uplifting pink, Petale de Rose, a soft and creamy rose; and finally, mouthwatering Peachy Cream. These fabulous lipsticks contain vitamin E and the famous Maxi-Lip©, which helps visibly plump lips, leaving them soft, pouty and moisturized. Too hard to resist!

Lancome introduces Juicy Tubes, an ultra-shiny moisturizing lip gloss available in four fascinating colours.

Energize your lips with MAC Sundressing/Colour lipsticks, iced in frost, pearl and shimmer. An interesting array of colours.

Chanel proudly reinvents lipstick with the introduction of a unique range, in Rouge Allure Luminous Satin Lipcolour. Scanty in design but maximum in coverage.

Boss Selection Eau de Toilette spray

PROM TIME: Girls, makeup is a very serious part of looking beautiful for prom night. You have chosen the perfect dress, the amazing accessories and your handsome date. Now make sure to choose the perfect makeup.

MAC introduces the limited edition of Sweetie Cake. The line consists of Eye Shadows x 4: 4 Sweetie Cakes – eye pencils, (Softsparkle, Pigments), nail lacquer, lipglass and petit-gloss. You are bound to knock him off his feet.

FRAGRANCE: Choose a fragrance based on the strength of your needs. In the summer months, try and wear a light scent during the day and a stronger scent for evening wear.

The exquisite gemstone bottle of Parfums Cartier's Delices de Cartier is an irresistible and delicious fragrance that combines freshness with sensuality. Stunning!

Lacoste's latest limited edition fragrance, Touch of Sun, was created with summer in mind. With feminine green accords, a fresh modern heart of rose, peony and jasmine, these wonderful ingredients evoke the radiance of sunset.

Estee Lauder introduces Pure White Linen, a fragrance that has a feeling of sunlit freshness. The soft spicy hints of white ginger and cardamom intensify the scent's sensation of cool, clear crispness.

Michael Kors Beauty introduces Island Michael Kors Fiji, a new destination in fragrance. It contains the Fijian tiare flower, the richness of tropical petals and the distinct quality of sparkling Polynesian waters.

The limited edition Ete by Valentino had created a fragrance to enhance a woman's femininity and beauty. It has a beautiful aroma of summer flowers. This elegant V-signature bottle is available exclusively at select Bay Stores.

For the modern man, Chanel introduces Allure Homme Sport. This fresh, sensual fragrance comes in a high-tech, attractive spray design.

Hugo Boss Brand presents Boss Selection, a high-end brand for the established man, bottling the smell of success and elegance. This remarkable scent combines grapefruit, mandarin and spicy pink peppercorn. This will launch exclusively at The Bay in June 2006.

The key to smelling good is finding a fragrance that you most enjoy! Have a great summer!

The remarkable life of Gershon Iskowitz

By IRENA KARSHENBAUM
Special to The CJN

With Calgary booming, there are some remarkable things happening in the city's art scene.

Helen Zenith and her daughter, Tamar, recently scored a major coup for their gallery, and the city. They became the official western Canadian dealers for the late painter Gershon Iskowitz.

After years of building a relationship with the Gershon Iskowitz Foundation, Zenith got 12 of the painter's works – ranging in price from $10,000 to $35,000 – from his estate. The foundation released a few of the painter's works to help fund the Gershon Iskowitz Prize. The works were on sale at Zenith's gallery, the Newzones Gallery of Contemporary Art, from April 6 to May 6.

The Miriam Shiell Fine Art Gallery in Toronto is planning a similar exhibition and sale for eastern Canada in September 2006.

One week before the show's opening, the most expensive of the works, Deep Mauve Painting #2, 1976, a giant oil on canvas, selling for $35,000, was sporting a red dot beside it, which in art gallery parlance means sold. "There are people who come to my gallery on a regular basis," Zenith says. "There was one person who was particularly interested and said as soon as you get them in I want to see them."

To see Iskowitz's works is to see a completely fresh and new vision of the Canadian landscape, one that is bursting with colour and innocence and one that is quite surprising considering it sprang from the imagination of a Holocaust survivor.

Born in Kielce, Poland, in 1921, Iskowitz survived Auschwitz and Buchenwald to come to Toronto in 1949, where his first major obstacle was to survive his extended family's lack of understanding for his calling. Adele Freedman recounts in her 1982 book Gershon Iskowitz: Painter of Light how his Aunt Frieda once cautioned her young nephew, "Look, Gershon, that man is an artist," pointing to a drunk lying in the gutter. Friedman wrote, "They believed anything was preferable to becoming an artist, even selling nylons or buttons. At least those were steady jobs and an ambitious person could make something of them."

Iskowitz was unable to tolerate his family's lack of support, quickly striking out on his own. For the next 10 years, he lived with artist friends and in an endless series of boarding houses. His meagre existence didn't seem to bother him. His relative freedom and his expanding circle of supportive friends allowed him to become prolific. "He found something that could take the place of what he lost," writes Freedman.

Iskowitz lost his entire immediate family: his parents, his brother, Itchen, and his beloved sister, Devorah, who perished in Treblinka, and his brother, Yosl, who disappeared at Auschwitz.

What might have ensured Iskowitz's survival was his endless passion for his art that never dwindled even during his internment. He managed to scrape together whatever art supplies he could: "Bits of brown paper and German inks bribed from the guards, coffee substitute, stray pieces of cardboard," Freedman writes, and he would draw at night the madness he witnessed around himself.

"I did it for myself," he recounts. "I needed it for my sanity, to forget about my hunger. I needed it to calm down." He hid his drawings in the floorboards of the barracks. He wasn't the only one. According to the Art of the Holocaust, more than 30,000 works of art survived by being either stuffed in various crannies around the camps or by being smuggled out.

While imprisoned, Iskowitz even managed to secure a couple of commissions, drawing the wife and children of one of the guards who was "bored with killing" for which he got a loaf of bread and a salami.

Iskowitz left Buchenwald with two of the drawings he did in the camps and a sense of an awakening. "He had discovered inside himself," Freedman writes, "a tremendous will to live, a love of life, which was inseparable from his need to keep drawing and painting. It is his experiences at Auschwitz and Buchenwald that allow him to say, now, that 'if you have got talent, you have got everything.'"

His art saved him again. After being rejected by the Canadian consul for having a limp, he met a certain Miss Shapiro who worked for the Joint Distribution Committee and arranged for a second interview. Iskowitz listened patiently as the Canadian consul rambled, drunk, and finally asked for a pen and paper. He did a quick line drawing on the spot of the consul and presented it to him. The consul was so stunned, he offered Iskowitz immediate entry into Canada, "You're going to be a famous person in Canada," he said.

The drunken consul clearly had vision because that is exactly what would eventually happen.

Iskowitz went on to represent Canada at the prestigious XXXVI Venice Biennial in Venice, Italy, in 1972 and his works were exhibited during his lifetime, a rare honour, at the National Gallery of Canada.

Iskowitz was faithfully married to his work and worked hard to evolve as an artist over his life. For the first 10 years after World War II, Iskowitz exorcised his demons through sketches and paintings that were dark and troubled. But with time and trips to the Ontario countryside, his vision began to change. He began to paint his adopted country with more colour and more abstraction.

But it was a single event, a simple helicopter ride in 1967, over Churchill, Man., thanks to a $1,750 grant from the Canada Council for the Arts, when his vision changed completely. The experience caused him to paint nature as if from above, through wild, childlike blotches of colour. These vibrant explosions, ironically, were born at night.

From 1960 onward, Iskowitz was living in his own home complete with a studio on Spadina Avenue in Toronto. He spent his days in cafés and restaurants, strolling through the streets and venturing into the numerous galleries daily to see what other artists were up to. Come midnight he would return home and paint until dawn his glorious visions of nature as he saw them. "My paintings are not abstract, they are real, they are very very much real, I see those things…I paint what I see," he said.

Iskowitz also gave back to the arts community by teaching, mentoring young artists and setting up the $25,000 Gershon Iskowitz Prize, considered one of the most prestigious visual arts awards in Canada.

Iskowitz has much in common with his younger contemporary, Elie Wiesel, who also survived Auschwitz and Buchenwald, kept silent about the horrors for 10 years and then spoke to the world through his first novel, Night, published in 1960, which led him to write more than 40 books and win the 1986 Nobel Peace Prize.

Zenith, whose parents are also Holocaust survivors, is thrilled to be bringing in Iskowitz's works to her gallery. She first discovered Iskowitz in 1975 while a fine arts student at the University of Calgary, "Knowing his background… I saw this wonderful burst of colour and energy, and I was in art school and it totally defined my direction."

Iskowitz, who died in 1988, left behind the testament that the human spirit can renew itself and happiness is once again possible after experiencing almost unimaginable horrors. Wiesel followed Night in 1961 with Dawn. Similarly, Iskowitz managed to see and convey beauty again, proof that hope springs eternal.

Spielberg's Munich questions the morality of conflict

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Three movies of note have recently been released on DVD.

Munich is Steven Spielberg's movie about the Israeli covert effort to assasinate the leaders of Black September, the group that claimed responsibility for the murder of Israeli athletes in Munich in 1972.

Golda Meir plots Israel's response in Steven Spielberg's Munich.

Some criticized it for being sympathetic to the Palestinian cause, indeed Spielberg was rebuked as "no friend of Israel." Actually, though, Spielberg's love for Israel is highly apparent, especially in the scene when the main characters's mother, played by Gila Almagor, tells her son Avner, "Whatever it took, whatever it takes, we have a place on earth at last."

Spielberg goes though great lengths, also, to show how careful the Israeli team was to avoid collateral damage. One scene shows them painfully trying to abort a bomb explosion on one suspect when they see his daughter in the house.

At first the movie moves slowly, almost repetitiously, from one bomb strike to another. It is only towards the last half that we see some character development as Avner, the lead Israeli agent, begins to grapple with the ethics of what he is doing, and becomes increasingly paranoid.

In the end, one suspects, Spielberg is questioning the whole morality of both the Middle East problem, as well as other current global conflicts. Do attacks and counter-reprisals settle anything? Are they worth it?

Will there ever be peace?

****

Lajos Koltai's Fateless is a dark, shocking film about the Holocaust as it unfolded in Hungary. Based on the semi-autobiographical book by Imre Kertesz, it follows a young teenager from his home in Budapest through to Auschwitz and Buchenwald.

Like any teen, Gyuri is a happy-go-lucky resourceful kid interested in the girl upstairs. But his arrest by a zealous Hungarian policeman begins a chain of cataclysmic events that will alter his life forever.

Marcell Nagy plays Gyuri with a lot of depth. His transformation from a hapless young lad to a beaten, yet determined young man full of life experience is remarkable.

The cinematography is stark and uncompromising. Nothing is held back in depicting the horror of the camps. This is a very thoughtful Holocaust film.

****

If the previous two films are too serious for your liking, then The Producers may be your cup of tea.

For a production that did so well on stage, the movie version of Mel Brooks' film was, ironically, a box-office flop. Susan Stroman's film seems stilted in comparison to the musical and to the original 1968 movie.

Nathan Lane and Matthew Broderick reprise their Broadway roles as Max Bialystock, the greedy, amoral producer, and Leo Bloom, the young accountant who hatches up the scheme to profit from producing a flop.

Bialystock settles on producing Springtime for Hitler, a musical about Hitler and Eva. Will Ferrel's role as the German playwright is delivered with his trademark over-the-top exaggeration, which fits this role perfectly.

Uma Thurman is equally entertaining as the sexpot Ulla.

JEWISH FOLK CHOIR PRESENTS 80th SPRING CONCERT

The Toronto Jewish Folk Choir celebrates its 80th annual spring concert with the première of a new work for choir and klezmer band and a new medley reflecting eight decades of music-making.

The 30-voice choir premières In Amerike (In America), by Winnipeg composer Sid Robinovitch, for choir and klezmer band. The popular Toronto quintet Beyond the Pale joins the choir in the new work, and also gives its own short set of instrumental music.

Robinovitch based the composition on a two-volume novel in verse by Montreal Yiddish poet Sholem Shtern. The piece was chosen, in part, out of a desire to honour the immigrants who founded the choir in the '20s.

Alexander Veprinsky conducts the choir. The soloists are Miriam Eskin, Belva Spiel, Mitch Smolkin and Herman Rombouts. Pianist is Lina Zemelman. Tickets $23-$19; children 12 and under free. Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St. Sunday, June 4, 7 p.m. For details, please phone 416-665-7766 (business hours), 416-636-0936 (evenings, weekends) or e-mail tjfolk choir@sympatico.ca.

Sister of Sheynville: The high-energy female sextet Sisters of Sheynville have performed their upbeat Yiddish, English and original material in many sold-out houses.

Band founders Lenka Lichtenberg and Isabel Fryszberg began working together in 2004. After a year of learning from the rich harmonic stylings of the Barry Sisters, the duo established the band with Fern Lindzon on piano and vocals, Lorie Wolf on drums, Kinneret Sagee on clarinet, and Rachel Melas on bass.

The band celebrates its first birthday with a performance at the Nadal JCC's Al Green Theatre on Thursday May 25, 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $12 in advance, $15 at the door. 416 924-6277, ext. 143. E-mail harriet@mnjcc.org.

Jewish Jazz: After a lengthy absence from Toronto, saxophonist John Zorn is preparing to perform with his group, Acoustic Masada, at the TD Canada Trust Toronto Downtown Jazz Festival in June.

Desirous of creating a new radical Jewish sound that would be relevant today, Zorn merged traditional Jewish scales with the sound of Ornette Coleman to create Masada. Besides Zorn, the band consists of Dave Douglas on trumpet, Greg Cohen on drums and Joey Baron on drums.

The festival is celebrating its 20th anniversary with more than 1,500 musicians performing across the city. It runs for 10 days, June 23 to July 2. John Zorn's Acoustic Masada performs at the Music Hall, 147 Danforth Ave. June 28, 7 p.m. Tickets are $55 & $40. 416-870-8000, www.ticketmaster.ca

Yiddish Poems: Songs to a Moonstruck Lady: Women in Yiddish Poetry is a bilingual collection of Yiddish poetry by and about women, compiled and translated by Barnett Zumoff. The volume presents masterly translations of 85 Yiddish poems by women poets and 60 Yiddish poems about women by male poets. The hardcover book is available from Tsar Publications. 416-483-7191 or www.tsarbooks.com

Names in the News: Toronto publisher-editor Cynthia Good, formerly of Penguin Canada and more recently of Humber's School of Creative and Performing Arts, received an honorary degree last week from Mount Alison University in New Brunswick… Violinist Maxim Vengerov plays with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra in two upcoming Shostakovich concerts, May 31 and June 1. And violinist Itzhak Perlman fiddles some Beethoven, Gabrielli and Bruch with the TSO on June 10 (416-593-4828, www.tso.ca)… Toronto singer-songwriter Jamie Wayne's recent CD for children, When I Grow Up, is reportedly being purchased by school libraries all over Canada. Wayne opens for country-bluegrass performer Whiskey Jack at Hugh's Room in Toronto on May 25.

Arts in Brief

• Hit the Road: Holy Land, a five-part TV series produced by Crossroads Christian Communications, airs May 22 to 26 as part of the Christian program 100 Huntley Street. Producers of the series, which offers a fresh and hip approach to travelling in Israel, received assistance from the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO). The program "is instrumental in reaching out to its viewers, encouraging Christians from across Canada and even the United States to visit Israel – the Holy Land," said Dani Shahal, the IGTO director in Toronto.

• The Paul Gellman Band, with guest Richard Keelan, appears at Hugh's Room, 2261 Dundas St. W., Wednesday, May 31, 8:30 p.m. $15 in advance, $17 at the door. www.paulgellman.com

• The Hello Again Collective presents the Canadian première of the adult musical Hello Again by Michael John Lachiusa. The story, based on a work by Arthur Schnitzler, features 10 nameless characters who explore the joys of sex, love and intimacy, jumping from bed to bed and decade to decade as they intimately examine the painful secrets of love. Tarragon Theatre Extra Space, 30 Bridgman Ave. $22; Sunday PWYC. Previews begin June 6, runs June 8 to July 1. 416-531-5018

• Author Bonnie Burstow reads from her novel The House on Lippincott at the Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave. June 1, 7:30 p.m. Free admission.

Hebrew theatre comes to Leah Posluns

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Milli Raviv loved the theatre, but her practical parents did not want their daughter to become an actress and insisted that she train for a profession with a steady income.

She became a dentist, and so did the man she literally fell in love with on stage, Eli Raviv. They met in their native Israel while acting in the same play; she had the role of his girlfriend.

Raviv is still practising dentistry, as well as working as a natural health consultant, but with her two daughters now grown, she has returned to the theatre.

Volunteers make up Montreal Israeli Theatre

She is the founder and director of the Montreal Israeli Theatre, an all-volunteer, independent troupe she created two years ago that performs in Hebrew. The company's aim is to produce "socially and politically relevant" plays, softened by humour.

The approximately 15 members all have day jobs outside the theatre or are students. Some, like the Ravivs, who have lived here 15 years, acted in Israel. The artistic director is Shimon Aviel, a Herzliah High School teacher.

"We just do it for the love of the theatre. We are like a family," she said. Raviv also wants to introduce Montrealers to contemporary Israeli plays and show another side of Israel that does not make the news headlines.

The troupe presents its first major production, Rabbi Kameah, June 5 at 8 p.m. in the 850-seat Salle Pierre Mercure of the Centre Pierre Peladeau, with English and French supertitles. Rabbi Kameah will be presented at Leah Posluns Theatre in Toronto June 15.

The playwright, Shmuel Hasfari, one of the leading theatre personalities in Israel, will be present to introduce the play and take part in a discussion afterward.

Inspired by Moliere's satire on religious fanaticism, Tartuffe, Hasfari's central character is a con man who sells charms that purportedly can produce miracles to gullible believers.

Rabbi Kameah (Eli Raviv) finds an ideal victim in Yaacov Suissa (Daniel Benlolo), a wealthy, middle-aged and secular businessman who turns his back on everything he achieved in his life when he falls under the rabbi's spell.

Milli Raviv is the founder and director of the Montreal Israeli Theatre.

The comedy has been popular with Israeli audiences, who are familiar with the divide between Orthodoxy and secularism.

Milli and daughters Tal, 19, and Nicole, 12, also have parts. The family also acts in the Dora Wasserman Yiddish Theatre. Eli, incidentally, is a Sephardi of Moroccan origin who has learned Yiddish.

The Montreal Israeli Theatre rehearses evenings in space at Decarie Square made available by its owner, David Azrieli, who lived in Israel for some years and has considerable business interests there today.

Although the subject of Rabbi Kameah may sound contentious, Raviv believes the show will be an opportunity for Jews of different religious backgrounds to get "together to debate, discuss and laugh." She is also hoping that non-Jews will also attend.

The theatre's motto is "changing the world through theatre, one play at a time." Raviv believes that through theatre, people will gain an appreciation of Israel and its people that is quite apart from politics and conflict.

"By viewing our plays, the Jewish and non-Jewish communities will have an opportunity to better understand the Israeli life and mentality. Maybe they will leave with their minds changed about us. We are the only Hebrew-speaking theatre in Canada with simultaneous translation in English and French," she said.

Any proceeds from Rabbi Kameah will go to the Jewish General Hospital for the purchase of equipment.

The company's first play was Best Friends by Anat Gov, a comedy presented by Milli and Rachel Yane at Concordia University's Oscar Peterson Hall last November, with English supertitles, to a sellout crowd of more than 500. The play explores the long-term friendship among three women.

Raviv is confident there are enough people in Montreal interested in Israeli theatre to fill a hall of the Mercure's size.

She was instrumental in bringing a professional production, a family comedy titled I Raised Children and They Betrayed Me, starring popular actor Ze'ev Revach as the old-fashioned Moroccan patriarch, to the same theatre last year. Although there was no translation, more than 1,000 tickets were sold, and a second show was added.

Raviv's dream is to develop the Montreal Israeli Theatre into a touring company, and she is eager to take reservations in North America and elsewhere in the world.

For tickets to the Leah Posluns show on June 15, call Shula, 905-881-1826. The theatre's website address is www.mtlisraelitheatre.com.

A tale of pickpockets and Toronto in the '30s

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The City Man* by Howard Akler, Coach House Books.

Howard Akler has made an auspicious literary debut with his first novel, The City Man, a crisply written tale that conjures up the look and feel of Toronto in the 1930s.

The story focuses on Toronto Star reporter Eli Morenz who, freshly returned from a convalescence in the country, writes a riveting series about a busy gang of pickpockets. His confidential source is Mona Kantor, a female Jewish pickpocket who teaches him the secrets of the trade as well as its peculiar underworld slang. Words like "prat" and "whiz" and "bates" become part of the book's core vocabulary.

Howard Akler

Mona works with a partner named Chesler. Delicately manoeuvring through the streaming crowds at Union Station, she helps get their intended victim into position so his lightning fingers can make the pinch.

Akler depicts their silent choreography as a complex dance in which they communicate by subtle gestures. Although he told me he sees pickpocketing as "a real legitimate, gentle art," it's a form of crime that doesn't always pay – as when Chesler lifts the promisingly thick wallet of a chassidic Jew only to find it filled with photos of naked women.

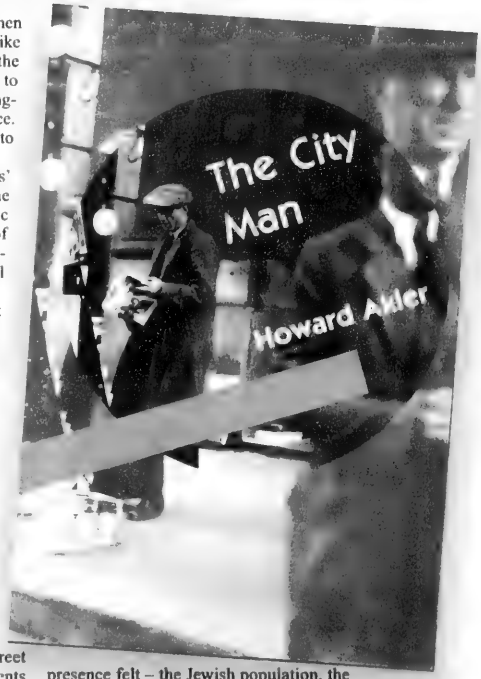
Chesler's relationship with his moll is stilted except when they're working, but Eli and Mona seem to fit together like hand and glove: they soon need each other as much as the city's dailies need crime stories to sell papers. They cling to their torrid clandestine relationship even as it is increasingly threatened by pressure from the newsroom and the police. Although it would be so easy, neither party seems ready to betray the other.

As Akler explores the minute corners of his characters' interior worlds, he offers fleeting views of the city that can be exhilarating. His spare poetic style bears affinities to the poetic prose of Michael Ondaatje as well as the hard-boiled detective fiction of '30s crime writer Dashiell Hammett.

The subtlety of the writing and the constant need to process and interpret the language remind us how subjective the act of reading actually is. Inevitably, every reader brings something different to the page. A minimalist with a healthy aversion to extraneous verbiage, the writer crafts his scenes like intimate snapshots of a much larger world that cannot be fully realized without the reader's imagination.

Born in the city 37 years ago, Akler writes of Toronto with reverence. Three of his grandparents came here early in the century and the fourth was born here in 1908; his father grew up on the very streets and era featured in The City Man. Thus, he explains that he's "reinventing and re-imagining" a setting central to his family history.

"Toronto became identifiable to me as a modern city, as the city I recognize, in the '30s," he says, citing Union Station, Maple Leaf Gardens and several Bay Street skyscrapers as among the familiar architectural monuments that rose around that period. "It was also the era when the early waves of immigrants were really starting to make their presence felt – the Jewish population, the Italian population. Toronto was starting to lose some of its British flavour."



Akler grew up in the Lawrence-Bathurst area and graduated from Ryerson's journalism program; he now lives on the edge of the Annex. He worked as a freelance journalist for years, supplementing his income by working in a bookstore. He is co-author of a previous non-fiction book, Toronto: The Unknown City, a travel guide published by a Vancouver press in 2003.

When he began the first draft of his novel about eight years ago – "it took years to write, for such a small book" – he envisioned it as a true-crime story involving an actual Toronto murder from the Depression. Eventually, he grew bored with his main characters and jettisoned them in favour of his secondary characters, who became his protagonists.

"So much of the image that I had of Toronto was 'Toronto the Good' and I don't think it was all that good," he says, in explaining what attracted him to the criminal underclass. "I think there was a whole range of characters that were unexplored."

Even so, he acknowledges that pickpockets are about the most genteel sort of criminals imaginable, very different than the truly violent gangsters and criminal types often featured in American crime fiction. In fact, pickpockets are often sneered at in criminal circles, he contends: "Bank robbers look down on them, safecrackers look down on them, even loan sharks look down on them." For all their gentility, however, Akler's pickpockets seem suited to their setting because "despite some evidence to the contrary these days, Toronto has never been that violent of a city."

The City Man has been nominated for two prestigious literary awards so far – the Books in Canada/ Amazon first-novel award and the Commonwealth Writers first-novel award for Canada/ Caribbean region. The book has also been optioned as a feature film and Akler has been commissioned to write the screenplay.

Meanwhile, it seems that his love affair with his native city will continue. "I've started another novel, but it's on the back burner until I finish with the [film] script," he says. "The next novel is set in Toronto in the '70s, and it's another attempt to re-imagine my city."

Alli's Journey helps young adults face cancer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Alli Shapiro and her mother, Pam Shainhouse Shapiro, don't want other people to go through what they have experienced for the last seven years.

Especially not alone.

When Alli was 19 and in her first year at Ryerson University, she was diagnosed with Hodgkin's lymphoma, a cancer of the lymph nodes. Since then, Alli, now 26, has had radiation and a stem cell transplant, and she's now undergoing experimental chemotherapy and taking medicines to regulate her condition.

"Every day is a struggle," she said.

She considers herself lucky that her family, particularly her mother, and good friends, have helped her through.

But many of the young people she has met over the years don't have that, she said. "One friend of mine came here for a job. Her family is in Manitoba."

She and her mother decided to found Alli's Journey, a non-profit organization that raises funds for critical care, counselling and assistance for young adults, 18 to 35, who are battling cancer, especially those with no support.

It really hit home for her, she remembers, during the SARS crisis in 2003. "No caregivers were allowed in, and everyone was dealing with things alone. I was an old pro at getting therapy, but there were kids of 16 and 18 who were there for the first time."

Princess Margaret Hospital, where Alli has been having treatment, has started Healing Beyond the Body, a chemo buddy program that will train volunteers to be with and support young people through cancer treatment. Alli's Journey is holding a fundraising event to help this project.

Take My Hand – An Evening of Musical Celebration and Mentorship will take place at the Toronto Centre for the Arts' George Weston Recital Hall, on June 1 at 8 p.m. It will feature the Canada Pops Orchestra, Michael Burgess, Jackie Richardson, Guido Basso and Bob Egan from Blue Rodeo, under the musical direction of David Warrack.

Pam Shainhouse Shapiro said the organization also plans to fund other projects.

"The next project might be a room at Gilda's Club [a support facility for cancer patients] for young people, or help for Wellspring, another support facility at Sunnybrook Medical Centre, to have more programs for young people."

The years between 18 and 35, Alli said, are a time when people are just starting to live – getting mortgages, starting relationships, choosing careers. Instead, cancer patients are suffering.

Despite all her treatments and therapies, Alli has managed to graduate from Ryerson in theatre production "with a high grade point average."

Best of all, two years ago she got married to her "quite remarkable" husband Philip Amar, who is "continuing the journey with me," she says.

Pam considers the couple's relationship "the ultimate love affair."

Tickets, which range from $100 to $180, are available through Ticketmaster, 416-872-1111 or www.ticketmaster.ca.

Walk/Run set for colon cancer research

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The National Colorectal Cancer Campaign (NCCC) is urging you to "Put Your Butt on the Line" and support its 10th annual Body N'Soul Walk/Run for Colon Cancer Research.

The event, which includes a five-kilometre walk or a 10-kilometre run, will take place June 4 at the East Don Parkland at Leslie Street and Sheppard Avenue.

Amy Lerman-Elmaleh, who at 19 lost her mother to the disease, and her aunt Bunnie Schwartz, whose husband Howard died after a long battle with colon cancer, founded the NCCC in 1996.

"We don't want people to go through this experience, and we want them to be screened so that they don't lose loved ones," Lerman-Elmaleh said.

Amy Lerman-Elmaleh

The NCCC has raised more than $2 million since its founding through the Walk/Run, its annual golf tournament (held in July), and its annual gala dinner (held in September).

Getting young people involved is a major goal for Lerman-Elmaleh and Schwartz, and they have incorporated a family fun day into the Walk/Run.

"The place is full of kids, strollers and dogs," Lerman-Elmaleh said, and everyone can enjoy clowns, bouncy castles, pony rides, and games with prizes. Participants also get a loot bag that includes a T-shirt and a water bottle.

The NCCC notes that colorectal cancer is the second leading cause of cancer deaths in North America for both men and women. It's also one of the most preventable, provided proper and early screening detects it soon enough.

Screening is best done through a colonoscopy, where a light is passed through the rectum and colon to detect polyps, which can be precursors to full-blown cancer.

The NCCC and the Canadian Cancer Society advises colonoscopies for anyone over 50, or anyone over 30 with a family history of colorectal cancer.

The NCCC has established fellowships and research chairs, financed state-of-the-art equipment, and supported research initiatives at many facilities, including Sunnybrook Cancer Centre, Princess Margaret Hospital, Mount Sinai Hospital, St. Michael's Hospital and Toronto General Hospital, as well as the Jewish General Hospital in Montreal.

Its Wendy Bear campaign is named after Wendy Sittler, wife of hockey star Darryl Sittler, who lost her battle with colon cancer. Sales of the $20 teddy bear provide patient support, such as the purchase of special equipment, palliative care and professional psychological services.

Darryl Sittler, honorary chair of the NCCC, will be at the June 4 event.

Registration on the day of the event is $25 per person or $50 per family, or you can pre-register online for $15 per person and $40 per family. Tax receipts will be issued. If you have raised $150 through sponsorships or any other way, registration is free.

For more information or to register, call 416-785-0449, or toll-free at 1-888-571-8547, or visit www.coloncancercanada.ca.

Iran called dangerous political entity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The former director of Israeli military intelligence brought a message of gloom and doom to Toronto last week.

Maj.-Gen. Aharon Zeevi Farkash, who stepped down from his post recently, told a fundraising dinner that Iran is on the cusp of developing a nuclear arsenal, and that jihadists, or Muslim extremists, are using the nascent democratic process in the Arab world to their advantage.

Fresh from speaking engagements in Warsaw and Tel Aviv, Farkash tempered his pessimistic comments by saying that the West can face these challenges by exercising strong leadership.

Farkash, who was recently quoted as saying that the Middle East stands before a "global jihadist tsunami," spoke at the Elmer S. McVety Centre-Canada Christian College in support of the Aleh Negev Foundation.

Founded in 1982 by a group of Israeli parents with severely disabled children, Aleh administers three residential facilities in Israel for mentally and physically impaired people.

It's currently finishing a 25-acre rehabilitative care village in the Negev for people aged 21 and older.

Aleh's chair, retired general Doron Almog, who appeared at last week's event, has a 22-year-old autistic and retarded son who lives in the partially completed village.

Farkash, Almog's friend and comrade-in-arms, described Iran's determination to build nuclear weapons as "a revolutionary development."

Warning that Iran is on the threshold of achieving this objective, he branded Iran as "the most dangerous political entity on the planet, the most crucial threat of the 21st century."

Farkash said that "hyper-proliferation" will plague the Middle East should Iran succeed, adding that Iran's efforts to increase the range of its surface-to-surface missiles and export its Islamic revolution are threatening.

Arab states are growing weaker under the process of democratization because Muslim fundamentalists, whom he branded as terrorists, are using it to advance their interests.

As an example, he cited last year's election in Egypt, in which the Muslim Brotherhood, an opponent of Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel, won more parliamentary seats than ever.

Farkash also pointed out that Hamas' victory in recent Palestinian legislative elections underscored the risks of promoting democracy in the Arab world.

He suggested that Arab-style democracy nurtures the forces of sectarianism.

Declaring that jihadists pose a "real threat" to the stability of Arab states, Farkash reminded his listeners that Al Qaeda's goal is to undermine and remove these regimes.

But Israel is a very important target for Al Qaeda as well, he observed.

Farkash said that a U.S. victory over the insurgents in Iraq will be a positive turn of events for the region, but for now, Iraq teeters between nation-building and violence.

Without elaborating, Farkash said the year ahead will be crucial in Iraq's efforts to rebuild itself after the fall of Saddam Hussein's Baathist regime in 2003.

Citing Israel as an example, Farkash said such challenges can be confronted through unstinting resolve and strong leadership, adding that Israel's armed forces contained Palestinian terrorism through a combination of good intelligence and motivated manpower.

"We reduced the capacity of the terrorists," he said, noting suicide bombings have fallen dramatically since 2002, the worst year of the intifadah in terms of terror attacks and casualties.

Collector turns his basement into a baseball library

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Give Peter Seidman a book about baseball that he doesn't already have and you're likely to score a bases-loaded home run with the Montreal-born collector of baseball paraphernalia.

But chances are you'll strike out in the attempt, because the 57-year-old teacher and administrator for the Toronto District School Board has already amassed more than 4,000 books and other collectibles on his favourite subject.

Seidman's baseball library fills a room in the basement of his home in the Glencairn-Bathurst neighbourhood of Toronto. The floor and shelves also hold a cornucopia of various knick-knacks, souvenirs and ephemera on baseball, from beer cups to round playing cards, team wristwatches to wall clocks.

The walls are lined with books from floor to ceiling. A row of toy baseball players stands on a shelf and a dozen pennants decorate the ceiling. Even the mezuzah on the door is adorned with baseballs. (The collection also includes a Chanukiyah featuring players on a baseball diamond.)

"We moved from our last house in Thornhill nine years ago – I just filled it up so quickly," he said. "I like to tell people that's why we moved."

A board member and former gabbai at Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, Seidman often goes on "baseball trips" in the United States, scouting for new property. As with many collectors, the thrill is apparently as much in the chase as in the acquisition.

He pulls some books from a shelf – including Safe! by Harold Sherman, all part of the "Home Run Series" for boys – and begins rhapsodizing. The books are rare and date from the 1920s. Seidman found them in a used bookstore in Madison, Wisc., and amazingly, the proprietor hardly knew they were there.

Seidman can't hide his excitement as he recounts the discovery.

"I asked, 'Got any stuff on baseball?' and he said, 'No, not really.' So I asked, 'Any books for juveniles?' and he said, 'Yes, I do, they're over there.' And there they were. They're old books and signed by the author. And he wanted $5 a piece for them!"

Baseball Joe Around the World is one in a series by Lester Chadwick, a prolific writer of nearly a century ago. According to Seidman, many of these old-fashioned, illustrated popular volumes were meant to provide role models for urban kids who might otherwise have fallen into street gangs. "A lot of it is a Horatio Alger type of thing, with a lot of moral teachings. In these stories, there's no swearing or smoking, and the good always wins out over the bad."

His library runs through multiple genres in both fiction and non-fiction. Mystery writers, for example, include Troy Soos, whose oeuvre encompasses such titles as Hunting a Detroit Tiger, The Cincinnati Red Stalkings and Murder at Wrigley Field. "I have them all," says Seidman, while professing not to be a fan of other sorts of mysteries.

As expected, his collection also includes the most popular literary works on baseball, such as The Boys of Summer by Roger Kahn, The Natural by Bernard Malamud, and Field of Dreams by W. P. Kinsella. Another is Hoopla by Harry Stein, which is "very well respected in baseball."

He also raves over False Spring by Pat Jordan, Small Town Heroes by Hank Davis, and October 1964 by David Halberstam. His personal favourite is Bang the Drum Slowly by Mark Harris. "It's a wonderful book, about a guy who's a third-string catcher. Robert DeNiro played him in the movie."

Why are so many baseball writers Jewish? By way of explanation, Seidman suggests that many American (and Canadian) Jews, from the immigrant generation onward, have cultivated an affinity for baseball as a wholesome outdoor physical alternative to the cerebral indoor world of the yeshiva.

Curiously, Seidman hasn't devoted any particular energy to chronicling the careers of Jewish ball players.

"A lot of those guys were not such great ball players," he explains. "They were in the minor leagues and they never made their Jewishness an issue, so why should I?"

A member of the Society for American Baseball Research, he receives its journal six times a year and often attends its international conferences, as well as local meetings of its Hanlan's Point Chapter when they don't coincide with Shabbat.

"I like dollar stores. I look for baseball stuff. They always have something." He holds up a package of paper napkins with purple baseballs printed on them. Then he unrolls a poster showing the evolution of the ballpark, featuring dozens of examples, including the historic Elysian Fields in Hoboken, N.J., and Montreal's Olympic Stadium, where his beloved Expos played.

More than an hour goes by in an interview with Seidman and he is still showing off baseball artifacts: a plastic View-Master with a slidewheel of ball players; cardboard placards from sports bars and newspaper boxes; vintage programs from the 1950s; a box of Wheaties breakfast cereal; even a souvenir baseball made of popcorn. Only the proverbial peanuts and crackerjacks are missing.

An eight-inch-high pile of index cards on his desk attests to the fact he has not updated his personal collection catalogue in many months. Even so, he says he can hardly wait for his planned retirement a few years down the road, so that – God willing – he can devote even more time to his collecting passion, tokens of which are evident throughout the house.

He produces a pair of nail clippers shaped, however improbably, as a baseball. "All of my friends are always giving me things related to baseball," he said. "It's a great out for everybody. They don't have to think 'What shall we get Peter for his birthday?' They already know."

Israeli hockey teams recruiting players

The Israeli Ice Hockey Federation will hold a tryout camp for their national teams on June 11 at the Canadian Ice Academy, 3111 Universal Dr., in Mississauga.

Tryouts are open to any player who holds an Israeli passport.

The federation is looking for players for the junior team, as well as the women's and senior men's teams.

Juniors and women will be on the ice from 12 to 2 p.m., while the senior men will skate from 2:15 to 5 p.m. The tryouts will be supervised by national teams coach Jean Perron, a Stanley Cup winner with the Montreal Canadiens, and junior team general manager Peter Friedman.

Prospective players are asked to confirm their attendance by contacting either Perron at coach@maisliner.com or Brian Sandler at 416-495-1781 ext 23.

Pe'er sweeps Prague; wins singles, doubles titles

By FRANKIE SACHS
Jerusalem Post

PRAGUE — Shahar Pe'er won the singles and doubles titles at the Prague Open earlier this month.

The Israeli 19-year-old defeated Australian Samantha Stosur in the singles final and was aided by a rain delay early in the doubles final as she regained strength before teaming with Marion Bartoli of France to take down unseeded Americans Ashley Harkleroad and Bethanie Mattek for her first doubles crown.

"It is my second final and second title. It was a great week and I'm happy for that," an elated Pe'er told the WTA website.

The wins saw Pe'er shoot up to personal bests in WTA rankings. WTA is the world governing body for women's tennis.

After coming into the week at 35th in the world, she moved up to 32nd. She also cracked the doubles top 50, settling in at 49th place.

Not necessarily too old for surgery

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

"I'm too old for surgery" said Morris, an 80-year-old gentleman sitting in my office. "My doctor told me it was too risky."

This comment followed my suggestion that I refer him to a neurosurgeon, as his CT scan showed severe spinal stenosis, a narrowing of one or more areas in the spine, which, in his case, caused great back and leg pain on walking, and severely limited activities he previously enjoyed. Morris' children and family physician had convinced him to see me. He was feeling very depressed, and they wondered if he might benefit from treatment for a mood disorder.

After the examination, it was clear that he was not suffering from a primary depression. He was despondent because of his pain and loss of independent function. It had progressed gradually and initially responded to pain treatments, acupuncture and some chiropractic care. But during the previous six months, he had become completely dependent on his children or a hired caregiver to get him out. He could not walk more than 50 feet without stopping for a few minutes because of pain, before being able to walk a short distance again. He was miserable.

When I suggested a referral to a neurosurgeon, he lamented: "I'm afraid of surgery. What if it doesn't work?"

I explained that indeed it doesn't always work and some people have bad outcomes, but I had a number of patients who did very well. I told him that getting a surgical opinion does obligate him to surgery, but it will allow a better understanding of the risks and benefits of the operation. I said the surgeon in question was very good with older people and explained things in a way that decreased their fear and anxiety and allowed them to consider their possibilities in a supportive way.

Morris agreed to go to the surgeon, saying, "The way things are going right now, I don't think I can go on – it is just too miserable."

He returned to me after the surgical consultation – Morris had agreed and a date was booked. He was quite animated. "He thinks I have a pretty good chance of improvement," he told me, "and anything is better than what I have now. I decided to take my chances."

I received a note from the surgeon some weeks later, saying the procedure had gone well. Morris was discharged home to an ambulatory rehabilitation program.

I waited impatiently for the next visit, six weeks later. I could hardly recognize the patient. He looked younger, and I realized that his facial expression had changed. Previously, he had always had an almost perpetually pained look on his face. I observed Morris come around the corner of the clinic and walk, unaided and briskly, towards my office. It was a wonderful sight!

During the visit, he told me how the surgery went and some of the minor post-operative difficulties, mainly related to his enlarged prostate, that were dealt with. Now, the rehabilitation program was going smoothly. He left with a firm handshake and assured me that he would come again in six months to let me see his progress.

The important lesson I learned from this patient is that we should not discount the possibilities of potentially beneficial surgery based on age criteria alone. Contemporary surgical and anesthetic techniques allow many older people to successfully complete challenging operations – joint reconstruction, bypass and other surgeries – which can transform the quality of life from one of misery and dependency to one of comfort and personal fulfilment. Explore and learn and then decide what feels good to you with your personality. Get good advice, consider it and then decide whether or not to follow it. It's ultimately your choice.

Epi on Education

The medium is the message

Seymour Epstein

I want to thank readers who voiced their appreciation of my last column ("My problem with Jewish continuity," CJN, April 27) on Jewish education as a force for creativity and development, rather than mere survival and continuity. Obviously, my intent was to expand the scope of Jewish education, not diminish it.

Many times, we at the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education are asked for measurable outcomes. Is there hard evidence that Jewish learning and Jewish experiences counter assimilation and intermarriage? In fact, there is such statistical evidence, but I wouldn't count on it. For one thing, there are too many variables. Anyone who thinks, for instance, that Jewish schooling and a Jewish camp can always undo the influence of an indifferent home environment is wrong.

And, in addition, Jewish education is a mitzvah in its own right, an expression of our tradition, with stand-alone qualities. If we look carefully at the mitzvah of talmud Torah, we learn something about its unique qualities. In the Talmud, this mitzvah is listed with others as having two characteristics: firstly, you can't have too much of it; and secondly, you enjoy the "interest" in this world, but the "principal" lasts forever.

Then the Talmud teaches us that talmud Torah is equal to all the others. It's almost as if the rabbis had consulted John Dewey and Marshall McLuhan on this topic. (Or was it the other way around?) Jewish education is seen to be meaningful itself, a mitzvah of its own. But it is also the one commandment of Jewish living that prepares us for all the others and insures the future of Jewish life. An hour spent with a Jewish text is at one and the same time Torah li'shma (study for its own sake) and learning for the future. Its value is measured by the learner and God, no one else.

It is both the means and the end, and that peculiar quality gives it the potential and the energy to far surpass mere continuity.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

Losing a loved one to terror

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

An Israeli changes his/her baby's diaper. Within a blink, that child is starting school, and before the parents know it, their little boy/girl is a soldier in the Israeli army.

Knowing you live in a country threatened by terrorists and tyrannical leaders and recognizing that one day the little eight-pound mass of miracle in your arms will protect your country must create an underlying fear that likely finds its way into the mother's breast milk.

Then one day an Israeli parent picks up the phone and the voice on the other end somberly says, "There has been a terrorist attack." No more words are required. Parents are parents and they know. Israelis are Israelis and living on the front line is part of their citizenship.

On March 5, 2003, Yossi and Lea Tzur received such news about their son, Asaf, who was one of 17 people killed in a suicide bombing of an Egged bus on Moriah Boulevard in the Carmel section of Haifa.

Asaf was an 11th grader, a lover of music and computers, and a sweet boy. One day Asaf was travelling home from school with his girlfriend, Ortal. She kissed him goodbye and descended from the bus. Three stops later a bomb, strapped to the body of a terrorist, exploded and Asaf was dead.

Death of a family member, especially through violence, frequently brings out a need within the survivors to grab hold of life with a fiery passion. Yossi and Lea Tzur, despite the depth of mourning they experienced, did indeed continue living, and only two short years after Asaf was murdered, they gave birth to another son – Eitan. While some of us might curse life and God and refuse to grow ever again, Asaf's parents, Israelis, did the opposite.

On March 12, 2002, Eyal Lieberman, 42, of Tzoran, was killed in a shooting attack near Modi'in. Eyal, a lieutenant colonel in the reserves, had many Arab friends for whom he helped secure working permits at the real estate company at which he worked.

After Eyal was savagely murdered, his wife, Idit, decided not to return to her place of work but instead began building a second career in music, an area in which she blossomed.

Amazingly, a year after Eyal's death, Idit performed in Eyal's memory at the memorial site at Yad Lashirion in Latrun. Idit has continued to use music as a way of expressing her feelings about her loss, and about the life she lives with fervour. She has turned her musical talents into a way of making money for the family, in addition to helping strengthen others.

Literature supplied to me by the OneFamily Fund, an organization that assists victims of terror, states that Eyal was survived by his parents, Ora and Dor, two brothers, his wife, Idit, and two children, Tomer, 7, and Alon, 4. Interestingly, the writer saw Eyal first as a son.

The Israeli-based fund provides financial assistance, therapy and legal assistance to victims of terror. OneFamily also distributes information on Israel's victims of terror because of the belief that "we cannot let victims of terror bear this burden alone." Since its launch in 2001, OneFamily has provided more than $12.2 million worth of assistance and programs for victims of terrorism in Israel.

Friends of OneFamily was launched in Canada through the efforts of such people as Pam Albert, the national director. Recently, OneFamily brought Idit Lieberman and Yossi Tzur to Toronto to speak about their lives after the horrendous experience of losing a loved one to a terrorist attack. To learn more about OneFamily, visit www.onefamilyfund.org.

God bless those who have died. Because of their courage, we can live safer as Jews everywhere.

Fanaticism is a threat, Wiesel warns

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Elie Wiesel, a Holocaust survivor who has been a voice for the voiceless for decades, received a standing ovation both before and after he addressed an audience of almost 2,000 people about the dangers of fanaticism and why we must fight it.

Wiesel, a Nobel Peace Prize winner in 1986 and the recipient of more than 110 honorary degrees from universities and colleges in the United States, Europe and Israel, was invited by Hillel of Greater Toronto to speak last week at the University of Toronto.

Before Wiesel, a Boston University professor, began his lecture on "Confronting Fanaticism: Building Moral Unity in a Diverse Society," he thanked Hillel for its work in helping to promote messages of love, respect and tolerance within the framework of a Jewish identity.

Throughout his lecture, Wiesel warned the audience, including hundreds who watched a live feed in a neighbouring building, that fanaticism is a threat to us all, and he tried to explain why people are easily seduced by it.

"The fanatic is seduced because [he] believes simply that he is superior… The fanatic believes that he alone has the key to God's paradise. The fanatic believes that only his words carry weight and others are empty of meaning and consequence …The fanatic has no questions, only answers, and the same answers. He doesn't have dialogues, only monologu…

and the fact that he is not bored by that is beyond me. The fanatic lacks a sense of humour. You will never see a fanatic laugh. He can shout, but not whisper."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Bernard Ostry Dies

TORONTO — Longtime federal and provincial civil servant Bernard Ostry died last week in Toronto of metastasized prostate cancer at age 78. The Wadena, Sask.-born Ostry was married to economist Sylvia Ostry and was a deputy minister in various federal ministries from 1974 to '85. He helped shape prime minister Pierre Trudeau's multiculturalism policy and also headed TVOntario from 1985 to '91.

New MDs Go Global

TORONTO — Esther Prince and Sigalit Hoffman of Montreal and Hagit Bergman of Toronto are among 19 graduates this year from the Medical School for International Health (MSIH), a venture of Ben-Gurion University's faculty of heath sciences and Columbia University's medical school. As the world's only medical school that trains students in global health, it includes subjects such as infectious diseases, nutrition, disease prevention and community health. The women spent three years in MSIH at BGU in Be'er Sheva and one year at Columbia in New York.

Arbib Sends Aid

TORONTO — Following Canada's recent $40-million aid pledge to the war-torn Darfur region of Sudan, Canadian Jewish Congress has facilitated a private shipment of $430,000 worth of medical supplies to Darfur from Walter Arbib, head of Canada's Skylink Group of Companies. The shipment was to arrive Monday in Khartoum.

Post Apologizes

TORONTO — The National Post apologized last week for a May 20 front-page report that said Iran decided to make its Jews wear a yellow strip of material on their clothing. The Post report raised a storm of protests in the West, including from Prime Minister Stephen Harper. But the newspaper ran another front-page story the next day saying that while Iran's Parliament had passed legislation setting a dress code for Muslims, there was no specific law singling out Jews.

WORLD

Cotler Speaks at YU

NEW YORK — Former justice minister Irwin Cotler spoke about "Jewish Values and the Pursuit of Justice" as keynote speaker at Yeshiva University's May 25 commencement, where he also received an honorary degree.

Hillel USA Plans To Double Its Numbers

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Hillel pledged to double the numbers of students involved in Jewish life on campus over the next five years in the United States.

In its five-year strategic plan, released last week, the largest Jewish campus group in the United States pledged to double the number of students involved in Jewish life, double its annual campaign, double funding to local Hillels, and launch an aggressive recruitment drive for campus professionals.

To help fund the effort, the Charles and Lynn Schusterman International Center will increase its endowment from $10 million to $100 million. Hillel also pledged to strengthen relations with university administrations, Jewish studies departments and Jewish communities where it works.

As a first step, Hillel sponsored a conference of university presidents and Jewish leaders last week in Washington.

Pioneer to Retire

NEW YOR — Sally Priesand, the first woman ordained as a rabbi in the United States, is retiring from Monmouth Reform Temple in New Jersey to become rabbi emerita. Ordained by the Reform Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in 1972, she told the New Jersey Jewish News she "didn't set out to be a pioneer or champion women's rights. I simply wanted to be a teacher of Judaism."

Appeal Denied

DETROIT — A U.S. appeals court upheld a 2005 decision to strip a former concentration camp guard of his U.S. citizenship. On May 22, the court denied the appeal of Iwan Mandycz, 83, a Detroit-area man who lost his citizenship for hiding his wartime activities when he applied to come to America in 1949. He was a guard at two camps.

Canadians Graduate

NEW YORK — Seven Canadians received degrees from the Jewish Theological Seminary at its commencement in New York last month. Jordana Mednick of Toronto and Deborah Zuker of Ottawa received master's degrees, while Vancouver's Isaac Elias and Ari Saks of Calgary received bachelor degrees. Robert Menes of Victoria received a master's of music and cantorial investiture, while Tobias Gabriel and Yvonne Youngberg of Toronto received master's degrees and rabbinic ordination.

Jewish Shop Attacked

BOCA RATON, Fla. — A teenager, Connor Ranieri, 18, confessed last week to vandalizing a Judaica store in Boca Raton, Fla., on May 21. He drew four white swastikas and a misspelled message that read "Bun the Jews." He faces up to a year in jail if convicted.77

Birthrighters plant trees in Alicia's memory

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Participants on birthright israel took part in a tree planting ceremony in Israel last week in honour of Alicia Ross, a Toronto woman who was murdered last summer by her neighbour.

Aviad Amitai, the leader of Canada Israel Experience trip Extreme Adventure 1, said he put in a request a few months ago to CIE to dedicate a tree planting ceremony to Ross, whom he became friends with after being in charge of security on her birthright trip in 2001.

While all CIE trips include a tree-planting ceremony – each one dedicated to someone else – Amitai wanted to do it in Ross' honour because of her love for nature and the outdoors.

Ross and Amitai clicked instantly when they met five years ago in Israel, and they remained friends and even travelled together in the years following the birthright trip.

A website created in Ross' memory says that her love for the outdoors and nature began in 1988, after her first canoe trip on Georgian Bay.

Years later, Ross became a tripper at Camp White Pine, where she led groups of children on canoe trips throughout Northern Ontario.

"She loved Israel very much, loved nature, loved the outdoors, and I just found it appropriate to commemorate her," Amitai said.

Ross' connection with nature was so much a part of who she was that her family created the Alicia Ross Memorial Fund for Youth in association with Project C.A.N.O.E. (which is short for Creative And Natural Outdoor Experience), an organization that helps at-risk youth ages 13 to 17 gain self-esteem and life skills through wilderness canoe trips.

Amitai said he and his group planted 50 trees – an entire section of a forest in Modi'in, Israel – during which Amitai spoke about Ross and how much it would have meant to her.

Dean Solo, 26, was Ross' high school friend and one of the birthright participants who planted a tree in her name.

"I thought it was a beautiful moment. It was thoughtful and touching of Aviad to dedicate it to Alicia, because he knows how much she loved nature and Israel," Solo said.

"Aviad spoke about her, said some kind words and showed pictures of her. For the people who didn't know her, this helped put a face to her name," he added.

Vanessa Emer, 25, also went to high school with Ross and planted a tree for her.

"It was extremely touching, and I felt very privileged to plant a tree in her honour. I lived down the street from her and [her murder] impacted the entire community and the Jewish community," Emer said.

"What Aviad said really helped people understand who she was, how connected she was to nature and what this would have meant to her."

To the heart of the editors

Part 3 of the highlights from the International Conference of Jewish Newspaper Editors, held May 7 to 11 in Israel.

From the editor's desk

The Shalom Hartman Institute in the picturesque Talbieh neighbourhood of western Jerusalem was founded 30 years ago by Rabbi David Hartman. Only the gate of the stone structure is visible from the street, but once you are through its portals, the architecturally elegant building unfolds in sectioned serenity along the gentle southern slope of the small, central Jerusalem hillside.

Born in Brooklyn, N.Y., in 1931, Rabbi Hartman immigrated to Israel in 1971 with his wife, Barbara, and their five children. Before that, he had spent some two decades in Montreal as a student at McGill University and as a pulpit rabbi.

The institute, which bears his father's name, is "founded on the belief that Judaism and the State of Israel must embody the principles of religious pluralism and respect for multiple approaches to Jewish life." Pluralism and respect are the high purposes and key tenets of Rabbi Hartman and his cadre of outstanding educators.

Our group of editors travelled on a sunny Tuesday morning to meet with the institute's fabled founder and current co-director.

Even though physically hampered by the obviously aching and painful consequences of a fractured vertebra, Rabbi Hartman spent more than two hours with us in an open, frank question-and-answer dialogue on a wide array of subjects.

With each new question and with each new questioner, he related his views to the nature of our work.

Indeed, it was precisely because of our work that he set aside the time to meet with us.

"As editors of Jewish journals," he told us quite emphatically, "you are responsible for our tradition." (But the way that Rabbi Hartman understood tradition, it soon became clear to us, was far broader a concept than that which one would likely find in the contemporary yeshiva world.) With weighty resolve, he reminded us that "editors are the public voice of the Jewish people. And the voice that we must hear is the voice of Jewish history, the voice of Jewish tradition.

"Force your readers to think," he pleaded with us. "Jewish newspapers must be the media of the best voices in the Jewish community. Those voices should be critical, not ideological. Do not allow any rigid orthodoxy [including religious Orthodoxy] to determine who you are!"

David Hartman

In his plain-speaking, mentoring manner, Rabbi Hartman was trying to fortify this group of visiting editors against the constant complaining of our respective readerships.

"Moshe did not lick honey with the Jewish people," he further elaborated for us, ensuring that we all understood the point he was making. "Nor did he lie about or to the Jewish people. The Bible is honest about us. Yet, we do not give up loving each other. Love does not preclude honest criticism."

The following are just a few of the many aphoristic capsules of insight Rabbi Hartman shared with us that morning.

• On the need to view Judaism as an interpretive tradition: "It is a great mistake to think that we were fundamentalists in the past. We were never stuck on the literal word. We always adapted to meet the needs of the world, we were always open-ended; it was always possible to change to meet the needs of the living world. The tragedy of post-Holocaust Judaism is that Orthodoxy turned inward and left ethics to the Conservative and Reform wings. Orthodoxy failed to try to live a fully integrated lifestyle." He cited Leviticus, Chapter 19 as an example of the Torah's ordaining that we incorporate our values into a fully integrated life.

• On the need for pluralism: "I have no problem with Conservative or Reform Judaism. At least they read the Book and are trying to interpret it. The issue is not Conservative or Reform rabbis. They didn't invent secularism. In some places [in North America], they are the only ones on the front lines."

• On the need to respond to human crisis: "Jews should be morally awake to problems all over the world. We cannot put on a posture of morality and behave or condone immorality."

• On the need to persevere: "I see hope because I am a Jew. God doesn't allow me the luxury of despair. I can't check out. My understanding of Covenant is to never give up, to never abandon this people. We mustn't give up simply because we have problems. We can't afford to despair."

Glancing slowly around the room, looking directly at each one of us in our turn, Rabbi Hartman told us he wants to be remembered as someone who never gave up, someone who always loved the Jewish people.

Scholar, author, educator, essayist, philosopher and raconteur, his insights penetrated the cynical souls of our group of veteran editors like electricity through moist air. It was a truly inspiring encounter with a truly remarkable thinker.

Paul Penna estate faces litigation over unpaid funds

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The donation that the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School received from the estate of Jewish mining magnate Paul Penna was not authorized under the terms of his will, according to a lawyer for beneficiary charities that were named in the document but did not receive funds.

Fred Tayar said he anticipates that a lawsuit by the estate against the original trustees, including Penna's business associate Barry Landen, who controlled the major decisions regarding the estate, will be filed "very quickly."

"Effectively, it will be on behalf of those charities [that were named in the will]," he said.

At the time of Penna's death in 1996, his estate was worth approximately $24 million, but millions of dollars have disappeared without explanation and no accounts were kept by estate trustees, according to court documents.

The eight-year-old Paul Penna School received approximately $725,000 from the estate, said co-president Michael Miloff, who declined to speculate about what would happen if the school were forced to repay the funds.

A dozen charities – including She'arim Hebrew Day School, Zareinu Educational Centre, Bikur Cholim, Yesodei Hatorah, Canadian Friends of Birkat Moshe, the Scott Mission and Trillium Health Centre – that were named in Penna's will have not received any money from his estate, Tayar said.

The estate's original executors were replaced by the Bank of Nova Scotia Trust Company and Ronald Rutman, an accountant who is also a board member of Zareinu, by a recent order of the Ontario Superior Court of Justice.

Paul Penna School spokesperson Schuyler (Skip) Sigel, a former board member, said the school "is committed to honesty, openness and transparency in all of its dealings. However, it's best to reserve any further comments at this time."

He added that a letter, signed by Miloff and fellow school co-president Paula Klein, was sent out to parents last Friday as a followup to an article about the Penna estate that appeared in the Globe and Mail on May 24.

"While the school has no information about the particular affairs of the estate as reported in the article, as you know, the school is named in memory of Mr. Penna following the donation to our school made through UJA Federation – all in accordance with a proper donor agreement," the letter said.

"No allegations of any wrongdoing have been made against the school in connection with this donation, and we are confident we properly handled all aspects of the donation. There is no impact on day-to-day school operations."

Tayar said the issue of the Paul Penna School is "a very sensitive, delicate issue that will have to be addressed by the estate trustees."

The school, which is housed in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, celebrates Jewish diversity and is set to open a middle school this fall.

Howard English, a spokesperson for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, confirmed that the estate's donation to the school was made through federation "in accordance with a proper donor agreement, and beyond that, because of potential court proceedings, we want to reserve all other comment."

Concert to aid disabled Israeli veterans

Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, Beit Halochem Canada, will host a "Celebration of Life" concert June 8 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts to raise funds for disabled Israel war veterans and victims of terror.

The show includes performances by the Latin Dancers Troupe, which features three dancers in wheelchairs, and the Savyon Trio, who will present popular Israeli songs. It will also include personal testimony from four Israelis injured in combat or in terror attacks.

Beit Halochem Canada raises money to help more than 50,000 Israeli disabled veterans and terror victims. Funds raised go in part to support four Beit Halochem centres in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem and Nahariya.

Since it became a registered charity in 1984, Beit Halochem Canada has contributed millions to fund medical and rehabilitation equipment for the centres. As well, every year, the Toronto Jewish community hosts a two-week visit by Israeli disabled war veterans.

On Aug. 22, Beit Halochem Canada will host its ninth annual golf day at Angus Glen (home of the Bell Canadian Open) and from Oct. 19 to 30, the organization will lead a mission to Israel.

Israeli environmental group comes to Canada

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Moshe Shemma makes his daily commute from his home in Jerusalem to his office in Tel Aviv, he passes Latrun, the site of a venerable monastery that's clearly visible from the road.

As he continues toward the coastal plain, he can see a cloud of smog blanketing Tel Aviv, about an hour's ride from Israel's capital.

"It's like a black strip," he said, working up a steam of indignation. "Do you know that more than 1,000 people in the Tel Aviv area die every year from the effects of air pollution?"

Pausing momentarily, he exclaimed, "It's environmental terrorism!"

Shemma has good reason to be upset.

As director of the international relations and resource development department of the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel (SPNI), he has a professional interest in Israel's environmental well-being.

A colonel in the Israeli armed forces, Shemma was in Toronto recently to publicize SPNI – Israel's largest environmental organization – and to lay the groundwork for the establishment of a Canadian "circle of friends."

SPNI, whose broad goal is to increase public awareness of Israel's precious landscape, already has chapters in New York, Washington, Paris and London.

"Now it's about time to open a branch in Canada," said Shemma, who for many years was executive director of the Conservative movement in Israel.

"We hope to enroll 10,000 families for our Canadian Friends of SPNI," he added.

Founded in 1953, with 100,000 members today, SPNI strives to conserve Israel's remaining open spaces, protect its fragile environment and preserve its scenic, historic and cultural assets through educational programs, nationwide campaigns and hikes in the countryside.

Shemma believes SPNI has a special role to play.

"Because Israel is so small and so densely populated, we have become crucial in preserving Israel's quality of life," he explained in an interview.

"Since there is constant tension between development and preservation in Israel, our organization wants to ensure that Israelis can coexist with their environment."

In the past half century, SPNI has launched a series of initiatives to save the environment.

Its main concern, however, is to preserve Israel's dwindling green spaces, 14 per cent of which have disappeared since the advent of statehood in 1948, mainly along a corridor from Gadera to Haifa.

"We have urged the government not to build new towns but to expand existing ones," he said.

SPNI also carefully monitors Israel's meagre 200-kilometre coastline.

Fifty kilometres are already closed to the public for the military's use, while 100 kilometres are either built up or zoned for construction.

That leaves a mere 50 kilometres for beaches, and thanks to legislation inspired by SPNI, this stretch of coast will remain basically intact.

In one of its latest endeavours, SPNI has begun work on a 60-kilometre hiking trail around the Sea of Galilee.

At present, a multitude of illegal fences, erected by kibbutzim and businesses, break up the proposed path. But once all 120 fences come down, hikers will be free to walk around the lake without encountering obstacles.

Shemma estimates that each kilometre of the trail will cost $160,000 (US).

As it has over many years, SPNI works to impose controls on unmindful factories that spew waste products into Israel's few rivers.

Due to its efforts, the polluted Yarkon River in Tel Aviv was essentially cleaned up, and now, the Kishon River, near Haifa, is being cleansed of pollutants.

Moshe Shemma

But SPNI faces enormous challenges on other fronts. The water quality of the Jordan River remains abysmally poor, and the Dea Sea is drying up at the rate of one metre a year.

SPNI intends to survey both bodies of water and submit a report to the government, Shemma said.

Air pollution, of course, is another pressing concern. "We encourage people to use trains and urge the government not to build new roads."

But SPNI lost a battle royal to stop construction of a major artery, Highway 6, the route of which extends from the Galilee to Kiryat Gat in the northern Negev Desert.

In his view, the government is not doing enough to protect the environment.

"Definitely not. The ministry of the environment is the smallest ministry with the smallest budget. There are too many priorities. When you have to prepare for war, it's very hard to convince the government to allocate more funds for the environment. But according to surveys, Israelis spend a lot of their time enjoying the outdoors."

SPNI is an accidental organization, having been set up by a group of Israelis to protest plans to drain the Hula Valley. The project went ahead, but years later, the authorities decided to flood the drained area and return it to its original state, thereby vindicating the concerns of SPNI's founders.

In one of its first campaigns, SPNI persuaded the Knesset to pass a law forbidding the picking of wildflowers. The legislation has been remarkably successful, but new Russian immigrants, not being aware of the law, have largely ignored it.

"We're planning an information campaign in the Russian community," said Shemma, whose work never ends.

Toronto teenagers work with Arab children

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

The average teenager is reluctant to share his or her personal allowance with anyone. Eighteen-year-old Liat Papular of Toronto and 62 of her closest friends do so with pleasure.

Papular has spent the past nine months in Israel on Workshop 55, Habonim Dror's yearlong program for high school graduates. Since socialism is a core value of labour Zionism, Papular dips into a communal fund whenever she wants to buy ice cream or a magazine.

"We are 63 people, but we function as one," Papular said. "We rely on each other financially as well as emotionally."

Workshop 55 participants are seen doing activities with Arab Israeli children from villages in northern Israel. [Liat Papular photo]

Workshop participant Talia Gordon, 19, said living as a socialist is "a complicated experience… It can feel very liberating. You work and play and sleep and eat with the same people. We've learned a lot about tolerance and patience."

Out of 10 Canadians on Workshop this year, Gordon is among the five Torontonians, while the others hail from Sault-Ste Marie, Vancouver and Ottawa.

Currently in its 55th season, Workshop is the longest-running yearlong Israel program with North American participants.

The Workshop adventure kicked off in September with a three-month stint at Kibbutz Netiv Ha'lamed Hey in Beit Shemesh.

In addition to studying Israeli history and socialist Zionism there, students experienced "old-school kibbutz life," Papular said.

"We helped to farm the paprika peppers on the kibbutz. A key value of labour Zionism is physical work, so our group contributed for a few hours each week," she said.

The group did a month-long tour of the country, attending seminars about the Holocaust at the Ghetto Fighter's Kibbutz and on the history of Habonim Dror.

"At the conflict-resolution seminar, we learned about solving problems on an international scale as well as relating to the dynamic within our own group," Papular said.

Resolving conflicts and coexistence are themes that have dominated the teenagers' year in Israel.

For the past four months, Gordon has worked in Migdal HaEmek, a small development town in the Central Galilee.

"I worked with junior high students in the town, and we spoke about the way that Arab Israelis are treated in Israel," Gordon said.

"With high school students, I went once a week with them to Nazareth to participate in a coexistence program with Arab teens.

"We discussed the differences and commonalities in Jewish and Arab societies. It was a cultural exchange," she said.

Papular also worked with Arab children in the north, running classroom programs for teens in the surrounding villages.

"The Arab kids saw that we were North American, but they were so shocked to hear that we were also Jewish," Papular said.

"From time to time, they'll say something stereotypical about Jews, like, 'All Jews want to…'" she said.

"I just tell them that I'm Jewish, too, and that's not what I think."

As time went on, Papular forged friendships with the Arab teens.

"At the final discussion, one of the girls said, 'When we first got here, we thought this was going to be a waste of time. But now we understand that you're trying to send us a message, and one day we'll walk forward together, hand in hand.' She was 14," said Papular.

Working in small villages has broadened Papular's perspective. "We've been exposed to different thoughts and ideas. The Arab villages have much lower standards of living than the rest of Israel. It definitely made me aware of the economic issues facing the country," she said.

Gordon, too, described her time in one of Israel's poorer areas as a learning experience.

"They put us up north in development towns," she said. "I now know that help is needed there. I got a much more realistic version of Israel."

"Migdal HaEmek is a very small town. They only have one main road. But I'm glad we got to live there," Gordon said.

"People got to know who we are, and we integrated ourselves into the community."

Back in Canada, Gordon plans to attend McGill University this fall, while Papular is still deciding between the University of Toronto and York University.

The Habonim Dror movement would eventually like to see the two make aliyah, however.

Papular, whose parents are Israeli, said that aliyah is "definitely something that I'm considering. It's an idea that's out there.

"I have a lot of thinking to do."

Union prejudice

Boycotts, divestment and sanctions are once again being wielded as weapons of choice against the Jewish state. But it is a weapon, most fair-minded people will agree, of the deliberately misinformed or deliberately malevolent.

The World Council of Churches recently urged its nearly 350-member denominations to seriously consider divesting from Israel as a way of supporting the Palestinian cause.

This past weekend in London, Britain's largest academic trade union, the 67,000-strong National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education asked its members to vote to boycott Israeli academics and institutions that do not publicly declare their opposition to Israeli policy in the territories. As of this writing, the results of that vote were not yet known.

Closer to home, last Saturday, in Ottawa, as reported by the Globe and Mail, the Ontario wing of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), Ontario's largest public sector union, voted to support an international campaign of boycott, divestment and sanctions against Israel "until Israel recognizes the Palestinian right to self-determination."

The ignorance in the CUPE posturing is breathtaking. Every Israeli government since 1993 has countless times publicly, officially, declaratively and legally recognized the Palestinian right to self-determination. The straw-man invocation by CUPE, therefore, is nothing more than a smokescreen, a high-sounding but malign cover for its real intention: to bring down Israel.

The words of the CUPE spokesperson as reported in the Globe and Mail are as transparent on the issue as they are offensive and objectionable. "Boycott, divestment and sanction worked to end apartheid in South Africa," said Katherine Nastovski, chair of the CUPE Ontario international solidarity committee. "We believe the same strategy will work to enforce the rights of Palestinian people, including the right of refugees to return to their homes and properties."

Nastovski hit upon the two key, resonating code-words: "apartheid" and "refugees." And in doing so, she sealed the poison into the envelope that she and her colleagues are intent on distributing throughout Canada.

But there should be no misunderstanding: the apartheid analogy is false, odious and immoral; and calling for the right of Palestinian refugees to return to their homes and properties is, in effect, calling for the dismantling of the Jewish State of Israel.

The single-minded, zealous preoccupation of these groups in targeting only Israel for exceptional, punitive treatment through boycott, divestment and sanctions – is no longer puzzling. It simply tells us a great deal about the true nature of the groups. We ask the broader CUPE membership, other trade unions and public officials to repudiate and reject the CUPE calumny against Israel.

Figures from Statistics Canada showed that almost 42 per cent of marriages involving Jews in Canada were with non-Jews. If marriages in which the non-Jewish partner converted were included, the figure was nearly 50 per cent.

Need to re-examine Conservative roots

Elliot Malamet's reference to Conservative Judaism's classic positioning in the middle ground is correct and, in my opinion, somewhat worrisome ("Whither Conservative Judaism?" CJN, May 18). In the context of a tennis metaphor, Conservative Judaism is positioned steadfastly between the service line and the baseline, referred to as "no-man's land."

Orthodox traditions are being eroded in the hope that a more egalitarian approach will attract a new and wider base of followers. Although this may be true, my sense is that potential new congregants who are attracted to this "Conservative-lite" process are already in the sphere of the Reform movement and as such will veer toward it. Conservative Judaism needs to re-examine its Conservative roots and stake out this position with a sense of pride and backbone.

Jews who leave Conservative Judaism

Elliott Malamet's column "Whither Conservative Judaism?" did not adequately answer the most important question arising from the answer to his implied question, "What happens to Conservative Jews when they leave Conservative Judaism?"

Malamet hinted at some movement by disenchanted Conservative Jews to Reform, which is largely true. A few of them do return to Orthodox Judaism, but the majority of Conservative Jews who leave that group actually do end up in Reform congregations. That's why Reform has become the biggest branch of Judaism in the United States.

This is very sad for Judaism, because there are so few fourth- and fifth-generation Reform Jews. On the positive side, more disenchanted Reform Jews than ever before are returning to Orthodox Judaism in recent years. Their numbers, however, are not yet great.

Remembering Ethel Raicus

I first met Ethel Raicus in 1969 ("Raicus was principal at Holy Blossom," CJN, April 27). I was helping pay my way through university by teaching Hebrew part time, and she invited me to teach at Holy Blossom Temple's Hebrew school. In those days, Holy Blossom was far less welcoming of kippot than it came to be later. Holy Blossom's position was that a kippah was not consistent with its philosophy (at that time), and so she could not allow me to teach at Holy Blossom if I insisted on wearing one. I, being used to a more traditional upbringing, was expecting to wear a kippah while teaching, as I did at other Hebrew schools.

I wanted to work in what was known to be a creative environment, and she wanted me to teach for her, but we were at a standoff. This seemingly unsolvable impasse lasted only a few days until she, with Solomonic wisdom, proposed the following compromise. Though not at all comfortable with my wearing a kippah, she would allow me to do so when teaching Bible, Neviim, siddur and similar religious texts. For my part, I would not wear a kippah for history, grammar and other non-religious subjects. In the end, thanks to her sensitivity and insight, I spent the next several years teaching at a wonderful Hebrew school, kippah on, kippah off.

'Community should be outraged'

My husband and I are active members of a Reform congregation and raised both our children in this environment. As adults they are both committed Jews who belong to egalitarian Conservative congregations.

While it is true that Reform and Conservative Jews often disagree about some practices of Orthodox Jews, we accept their right to practise as they believe. Unfortunately, the same cannot be said about many within the Orthodox community regarding the practices of Reform and Conservative Jews.

Given this situation, I was nonetheless shocked and disturbed to read Rabbi Meir Wagner's letter (CJN, May 18), likening the boycott by some of the recent Yom Hashoah memorial program at Earl Bales Park (because of the male-only singing) to Holocaust denial. How dare Rabbi Wagner make such a comparison. The Toronto Jewish community should be outraged.

Morris King started the King Theatre

In Ze'ev Glicenstein's column "Some early film pioneers," (CJN, May 4), one name is missing – Morris King, my father, who started the King Theatre on Dundas Street in Toronto.

When my uncle, Harry Alexander, couldn't make a living, my father took him into the theatre and when there was not enough income for two families, dad turned the theatre over to his brother-in-law.

As a teenager, I was the envy of my friends when I could pop into a movie palace by simply waving at an uncle. A free ride!

'Be strong and of good courage'

Excerpts from the address by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to a joint session of the U.S. Congress on May 24.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Vice President, distinguished members of the U.S. Congress, ladies and gentlemen, on behalf of the people and the State of Israel, I wish to express my profound gratitude to you for the privilege of addressing this joint meeting of the U.S. Congress…

Our two great nations share a profound belief in the importance of freedom and a common pioneering spirit deeply rooted in optimism.

It was the energetic spirit of our pioneers that enabled our two countries to implement the impossible. To build cities where swamps once existed and to make the desert bloom…

I come here, to this home of liberty and democracy, to tell you that my parents' dream, our dream, has only been partly fulfilled. We have succeeded in building a Jewish democratic homeland. We have succeeded in creating an oasis of hope and opportunity in a troubled region. But there has not been one year, one week, even one day of peace in our tortured land.

Our Israeli pioneers suffered, and their struggle was long and hard. Yet even today, almost 60 years after our independence, that struggle still endures. Since the birth of the State of Israel and until this very moment, we have been continually at war and amidst confrontation. The confrontation has become even more violent, the enemy turned even more inhumane due to the scourge of suicide terrorism. But we are not alone. Today, Israel, America, Europe, and democracies across the globe, unfortunately, face this enemy.

Over the past six years, more than 20,000 attempted terrorist attacks have been initiated against the people of Israel. Most, thankfully, have been foiled by our security forces. But those which have succeeded have resulted in the deaths of hundreds of innocent civilians and the injury of thousands – many of them children guilty only of being in what proved to be the wrong place at the wrong time.

These are not statistics. These are real people with beautiful souls that have left this earth far too soon…

Our countries do not just share the experience and pain of terrorism. We share the commitment and resolve to confront the brutal terrorists that took these innocent people from us. We share the commitment to extract from our grief a renewed dedication to providing our people with a better future.

Let me state this as clearly as I can: we will not yield to terror. We will not surrender to terror. And we will win the war on terror and restore peace to our societies.

The Palestinian Authority is ruled by Hamas, an organization committed to vehement anti-Semitism, the glorification of terror and the total destruction of Israel. As long as these are their guiding principles, they can never be a partner…

Like America, Israel seeks to rid itself of the horrors of terrorism. Israel yearns for peace and security. Israel is determined to take responsibility for its own future and take concrete steps to turn its dreams into reality. The painful but necessary process of disengagement from the Gaza Strip and northern Samaria was an essential step…

With the vision of [former Israeli] prime minister Ariel Sharon [Israel as a democratic state with a Jewish majority, within permanent and defensible borders and with a united Jerusalem as its capital that is open and accessible for the worship of all religions] guiding my actions, from this podium today, I extend my hand in peace to Mahmoud Abbas, elected president of the Palestinian Authority. On behalf of the State of Israel, we are willing to negotiate with a Palestinian Authority. This authority must renounce terrorism, dismantle the terrorist infrastructure, accept previous agreements and commitments, and recognize the right of Israel to exist.

Let us be clear: peace, without security, will bring neither peace nor security. We will not, we cannot, compromise on these basic tests of partnership.

With a genuine Palestinian partner for peace, I believe we can reach an agreement on all the issues that divide us. Our past experience shows us it is possible to bridge the differences between our two peoples. I believe this – I know this because we have done it before, in our peace treaties with Egypt and with Jordan. These treaties involved painful and difficult compromises. It required Israel to take real risks.

But if there is to be a just, fair and lasting peace, we need a partner who rejects violence and who values life more than death. We need a partner that affirms in action, not just in words, the rejection, prevention and elimination of terror…

The lesson for the Palestinian people is clear. In a few years they could be living in a Palestinian state, side by side in peace and security with Israel. A Palestinian State which Israel and the international community would help thrive.

But no one can make this happen for them if they refuse to make it happen for themselves.

For thousands of years, we Jews have been nourished and sustained by a yearning for our historic land. I, like many others, was raised with a deep conviction that the day would never come when we would have to relinquish parts of the land of our forefathers. I believed, and to this day still believe, in our people's eternal and historic right to this entire land…

But… we have to compromise in the name of peace, to give up parts of our promised land in which every hill and every valley is saturated with Jewish history and in which our heroes are buried. We have to relinquish part of our dream to leave room for the dream of others, so that all of us can enjoy a better future. For this painful but necessary task my government was elected. And to this I am fully committed.

We hope and pray that our Palestinian neighbors will also awaken. We hope they will make the crucial distinction between implementing visions that can inspire us to build a better reality, and mirages that will only lead us further into the darkness. We hope and pray for this, because no peace is more stable than one reached out of mutual understanding not just for the past but for the future…

And so I ask of the Palestinians: How can a child growing up in a culture of hate dream of the possibility of peace? It is so important that all schools and all educational institutions in the region teach our children to be hate-free.

The key to a true lasting peace in the Middle East is in the education of the next generation.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert addressing the U.S. Congress [RNS/Reuters photo]

So let us today call out to all peoples of the Middle East: replace the culture of hate with an outlook of hope…

The Road Map [peace plan] was and remains the right plan. A Palestinian leadership that fulfils its commitments and obligations will find us a willing partner in peace. But if they refuse, we will not give a terrorist regime a veto over progress or allow it to take hope hostage.

We cannot wait for the Palestinians forever. Our deepest wish is to build a better future for our region, hand in hand with a Palestinian partner, but if not, we will move forward, but not alone… Success will only be possible with America as an active participant, leading the support of our friends in Europe and across the world.

Should… the Palestinians ignore our outstretched hand for peace, Israel will seek other alternatives to promote our future and the prospects of hope in the Middle East. At that juncture, the time for realignment will occur.

Realignment would be a process to allow Israel to build its future without being held hostage to Palestinian terrorist activities. Realignment would significantly reduce the friction between Israelis and Palestinians and prevent much of the conflict between our two battered nations.

The goal is to break the chains that have tangled our two peoples in unrelenting violence for far too many generations…

Allow me to turn to another dark and gathering storm casting its shadow over the world. Every generation is confronted with a moment of truth and trial. From the savagery of slavery, to the horrors of World War II, to the gulags of the Communist Bloc. That which is right and good in this world has always been at war with the horrific evil permitted by human indifference.

Iran, the world's leading sponsor of terror and a notorious violator of fundamental human rights, stands on the verge of acquiring nuclear weapons. With these weapons, the security of the entire world is put in jeopardy.

We deeply appreciate America's leadership on this issue and the strong bipartisan conviction that a nuclear-armed Iran is an intolerable threat to the peace and security of the world. It cannot be permitted to materialize. This Congress has proven its conviction by initiating the Iran Freedom and Support Act. We applaud these efforts.

A nuclear Iran means a terrorist state could achieve the primary mission for which terrorists live and die: the mass destruction of innocent human life.

This challenge, which I believe is the test of our time, is one the West cannot afford to fail.

The radical Iranian regime has declared the United States its enemy. Their president believes it is his religious duty and his destiny to lead his country in a violent conflict against the infidels. With pride, he denies the Jewish Holocaust and speaks brazenly, calling to wipe Israel off the map.

For us, this is an existential threat. A threat to which we cannot consent. But it is not Israel's threat alone. It is a threat to all those committed to stability in the Middle East and the wellbeing of the world at large…

Our moment is now. History will judge our generation by the actions we take now, by our willingness to stand up for peace and security and freedom, and by our courage to do what is right.

The international community will be measured not by its intentions but by its results. The international community will be judged by its ability to convince nations and peoples to turn their backs on hatred and zealotry.

If we don't take Iran's bellicose rhetoric seriously now, we will be forced to take its nuclear aggression seriously later…

The Bible tells us that as Joshua stood on the verge of the Promised Land, he was given one exhortation: "Chazak ve'ematz" –"Be strong and of good courage."

Strength, without courage, will lead only to brutality. Courage, without strength, will lead only to futility. Only genuine courage and commitment to our values, backed by the will and the power to defend them, will lead us forward in the service of humanity.

To the Congress of the United States and to the great people of America, on behalf of the people of Israel I want to say chazak ve'ematz – be strong and of good courage, and we, and all peoples who cherish freedom, will be with you…

A half-century of success

I am one of five rabbis in Canada who was ordained by the Leo Baeck College in London, England. Other graduates serve in the United States, Holland, Germany, France, Australia, South Africa and Israel. The six college alumni who today lead congregations in the former Soviet Union have made a historic contribution to the revival of Jewish life there. If the college had done nothing else than ordaining them, it would have earned its place in Jewish history.

Rabbi Dave Marmur in Toronto

But it has done much more. Many of the 150 graduates live and work in the United Kingdom, serving the two liberal movements there as well as Conservative congregations. Thanks to them, non-Orthodox Judaism has come to flourish again in Europe.

In the beginning of July, many will gather in London to celebrate 50 years of the existence of our alma mater. The celebrations will include this year's graduation ceremony and a special welcome to the new principal, renowned scholar Rabbi Marc Saperstein of the United States.

The pioneers who in 1956 with meagre resources and little experience established a rabbinic school in London were determined to revive Jewish life in Europe after the Holocaust. The school was originally to be called the Jewish Theological College, and Rabbi Leo Baeck, the great leader of pre-war German Jewry who came to epitomize Jewish survival and continuity during and after the Shoah, was to be the keynote speaker at the opening ceremony. But he was too ill to attend and died shortly afterward. The college was then named in his memory.

I came to the college from Sweden in 1957. I knew that it was a small institution, still in its infancy, but when I discovered that I would be one of only six students, I almost panicked. My repressed Swedish upbringing prevented me from acting out.

Reform Judaism was then still on the periphery of Anglo-Jewry. This further contributed to my sense of marginality and isolation. It was one of several reasons why my time there was difficult. But after five years, I not only had a rabbinic diploma and a position in a marvelous congregation, which I served for seven, very happy years, but my wife and I also had by then two of our three children, one of whom is today a rabbi and a teacher of rabbis in Israel.

The Leo Baeck College gave me direction in life. It imbued me with a sense of purpose in survival. What was true for me as an individual, the college made true for many Jewish communities around the world. I hope and pray that the next 50 years will be no less fruitful and even more successful.

The uses and abuses of instant messaging

Over the last 10 years or so, online instant messaging has become a hugely successful and popular form of communication for children, teens, young adults and parents who crave an alternative method of communicating with children who have flown the coop. (Being the lone contact on my mother's MSN list seems to work for her, but it's proven to be difficult on my end.)

Matthew Pattens in Halifax

One of the earliest forms of instant messaging was a program called ICQ (get it? – "I seek you"). Since then, AOL and MSN messenger have taken over the instant messaging world and have turned what was once a simple forum for two chatting friends into a highly advanced form of communication.

I use MSN Messenger as my primary instant messaging program. I find it most useful for making quick plans with friends, asking a classmate a question about school, or sending a quick hello to a friend who is travelling or away at school.

People use MSN for many different reasons. For example, I've seen friends of mine ask girls they are interested in for their MSN contact information rather than their phone numbers. Why would a guy prefer to speak to a girl via a computer rather than hear her voice on the telephone? Simple: instant messaging eliminates the pressure of putting yourself out there and having to come up with good stories, funny jokes and witty responses to keep that special someone on the other end of the line entertained.

With instant messaging, you have all the time in the world, without the treacherous period of waiting for the positive response of laughter after a telling a silly story. While this can be seen as positive, as it allows you to speak to someone and express yourself concisely, instant messaging eliminates the personal aspect of communication. Besides, how can you really know if a girl is actually laughing when she types "hahaha."

Having girls that you are attracted to on your MSN list can create a number of other anxieties. It may appear that she's avoiding you because of the service's various options. Even if she's online, she may have her computer set to "away," suggesting she's not there – but is she? Some people have their computer permanently set to "away," so is it personal if she doesn't respond? Plus, if she isn't responding three-quarters of the time, is it because you're constantly messaging her and she thinks you're coming on too strong? Are these messages piling up to the point that it bothers her? MSN Messenger can drive someone crazy!

Instant messaging can also eliminate personal confrontation – but not always for the better.

Recently, a friend of mine had to put an end to a relationship with a girl. When he began talking to her in the car during a ride home, he explained that going to different camps and different schools meant that their future appeared bleak. My friend said later that he felt like he was talking to a wall – a plain white wall with no designs or pictures on it. The girl had close to nothing to say to him. Sure enough, after he dropped her off, got home and signed on to MSN, she was waiting for him online – and suddenly she had plenty to say. She hit him with what might be called a romantic novel.

Again, you see how people can express themselves more easily through a computer, as it eliminates the need and pressure for quick, smart responses, and it makes it easier to be direct.

But I disagree with using instant messaging for any kind of important or meaningful conversation. If people become dependent on instant messaging for all of their difficult social interactions, how will they fare in job interviews and real-life, face-to-face communication? I don't know if a future employer would be willing to hold a computer screen over his or her face during an interview while the subject racks his or her brain for the correct response to a question.

On the topic of weather, I'm just warming up

I've decided that the greatest evil, aside from perhaps the spork, is the weather. It seems that no matter the day or season, the weather always seems to be plotting to make your life harder. While we wait for a bus, wet from rain, frozen in snow, or sweltering in heat, we're never quite comfortable.

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

The one redeeming thing about the weather is its conversational neutrality. What would total strangers talk about without it? It seems that no matter how ignorant or sheltered they are, most people know about the weather. This makes it the safest possible conversation topic. And you never have to worry about offending someone, since it's pretty rare for a person to get angry at a declaration of distaste for rain or snow.

Aside from this, the weather pretty much sucks. Firstly, you never know what it will be. There are con artists – we call them "weathermen" – who pretend to make accurate predictions about the weather. They pretend to use satellites and science, lying through their teeth as they keep changing their guesses. Let's say you're planning a picnic for next week. The first day you check, the forecast looks beautiful: no rain, no wind, and a high of 20 Celsius. Two days later, they've changed the forecast: expect some wind and a high of 15. The day after that, they forecast a small chance of rain, with gusting winds. By the day before your planned picnic, conditions have deteriorated and they're predicting a category 5 hurricane.

Weather has many negative effects. Mosquitoes? They get worse after rain. Drought? No rain when you need it. Hail dents your car. Rain floods your basement. Wind blows your hat off. Sweltering heat makes you sweat. And you can get sunburned, frostbitten, sick, diseased, tired and unhappy, all because of the weather.

Another little-known fact is that the weather displays malicious sentience. It will only rain on days when you don't have a jacket or umbrella, or on days when you've planned some outdoor event, or on days when you're required to wait at a bus stop, or any combination of the above. If anyone mentions snow, it will come. Storms hit open water only when it helps move the plot of a boat-centred B-movie. Tornadoes only strike soft targets, such as trailers, barns and cows.

The most talked about weather-related issue is global warming. It's said to be causing all sorts of natural disasters. If this is true, weather is in fact so evil that it's plotting to destroy us all. After some careful study (two minutes on Google, 1.5 minutes tying my shoelaces, and a quick daydream), I've confirmed that the causes of global warming are greenhouse gases.

Major greenhouse gases include water vapour (made by boiling water), carbon dioxide (made by breathing), methane (farting), nitrous oxide (a common dental anesthetic) and ozone (used to disinfect water before bottling). By extension, any person who partakes in hot beverages, breathes, passes gas, sees a dentist or drinks water is a cause of global warming. Using such lateral thinking, we can clearly recognize the people in society who are callous and uncaring when it comes to our global wellbeing. I can also conclusively state that weathermen all over the world have partaken in some or all of these dangerous and irresponsible behaviours.

It's quite clear that these people have been planning this global warming for some time. Perhaps they were so tired of getting the weather wrong that they decided to heat things up. Once the world has warmed up, forecasting will be simple. Tonight will be hot. Tomorrow, hot. The day after? Hot. Next week? You guessed it.

Actually, I don't think it would be all that bad if it got hotter. There would be no more shovelling the driveway and no more walks to the bus stop when it's 35 below, and every day could be a potential day at the beach. Shorts could be formalwear, and everyone would be tanned. And that picnic you were planning? Next week will be hot. The weatherman guarantees it.

Most importantly, you can still talk about the weather with total strangers.

I should know. I'm doing it right now.

The Kirshner File

Becker was a prominent literary figure

Jurek Becker did not strike a chord of recognition in North America before his untimely death in 1997 at the relatively young age of 59, despite his status as one of Germany's most prominent literary figures.

A Polish Jew and a Holocaust survivor who settled in Berlin in 1945, Becker was the author of Jacob the Liar, the first comic novel about the Shoah, and a successful film and television scriptwriter as well.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

He was born in Lodz, the textile capital of Poland, and his mother tongue was Polish. His secular, middle-class parents had spoken Yiddish as youths, but had let it lapse in adulthood.

During the German occupation of Lodz, Becker worked in a cigarette factory. When the Nazis liquidated the ghetto in August 1944, Becker's father vanished, only to turn up at Auschwitz. He and his mother were shipped to Ravensbruck, a concentration camp in Germany. Becker's mother died of tuberculosis in Sachsenhausen, and after the war, thanks to the assistance of the American Joint Distribution Committee, he was reunited with his father.

As Sander Gilman suggests in his fine, exceptionally well-researched biography, Jurek Becker: A Life in Five Worlds (University of Chicago Press), Becker's father was one of those survivors who had no desire whatsoever to return to Poland, and because he was not in the best of health, he was not eligible to immigrate to the United States. So he remained in the eastern sector of Berlin, just too tired to leave, and Becker grew up in the communist German Democratic Republic, or East Germany.

Becker learned German, his window into German culture, by listening to radio broadcasts. He did not want to be marked as a foreigner, but his official status as a "victim of fascism" set him apart as an object of pity and even derision.

As Becker did not wish to be "different," and sought to identify himself as a German, he preferred to be known as a "citizen of Jewish ancestry" rather than as a Jew. And like most Jews in East Germany, which discouraged the observance of Judaism, he distanced himself from his Jewish identity.

The negative associations of being Jewish would permeate his novels, Gilman, his old friend, writes. But as he grew older, being Jewish ceased to be negative to him.

Becker's life as a writer really began when he enrolled at Humboldt University to study philosophy and law. He started writing poetry and film criticism for a campus cabaret and a student's magazine. But in 1960, long before he was due to take his final exams, he was suspended from the university on disciplinary grounds.

Finding himself at loose ends, Becker enrolled in a screenwriter's course at the Film and Television College at Babelsberg, the hub of East Germany's movie industry. That led to a fruitful career.

Becker's first full-length screenplay was a comedy of manners about a Czech traveller who finds himself stranded in East Berlin without a passport. The film added to his growing reputation as a master of light comedies and of dialogue and plot.

In 1961, when he was 24, Becker went back to Poland to find whatever scraps he could of his family's presence in Lodz. The trip prompted him to experiment with a topic that was both very personal and virtually taboo in East Germany: the murder of the Jews of Europe. When Becker finally got down to writing Jacob the Liar as a movie script, Frank Beyer's film dealing with the Holocaust, Naked Among Wolves, had just been released.

When production of Jacob the Liar was abruptly cancelled, Becker rewrote it as a novel. In East Germany, novels were considered less dangerous than films. Published in 1969, Jacob the Liar – described by Gilman as "the most important survivor novel written in German" – was unusual, to say the least.

Representing the Holocaust in a comic vein, the novel garnered ecstatic reviews in both East Germany and West Germany. But as a result of his association with Jacob the Liar, Becker was pigeonholed as a "professional" Jew.

The book's success coincided with his sense of alienation from the Marxist regime. Prior to its publication, the Soviet Union and its allies, including East Germany, had invaded Czechoslovakia to crush Alexander Dubcek and his band of reformers.

Becker had been a supporter of the Prague Spring and believed that the Warsaw Pact invasion was an arch betrayal. At a meeting of the German Writers' Union, he was among the very few who refused to sign a manifesto in its support.

The events in Czechoslovakia also shaped his sense of identity. How could the Democratic German Republic condemn Israel and the United States when it itself had become an aggressor?

Jurek Becker

Eventually, Becker was removed from the leadership of the Berlin chapter of the German Writers' Union and accused of being a "counter-revolutionary," a serious accusation in a repressive country like East Germany.

Nevertheless, due to his belief that the German Democratic Republic could reform itself, Becker considered himself a member of the "loyal opposition." Be that as it may, he was placed under surveillance by the Ministry of State Security (Stasi).

Jacob the Liar, whose success enabled Becker to travel to the West starting in 1973, was finally released as a film in 1974 on television. Nominated for an Academy Award for best foreign film, it won the Silver Bear prize at the Berlin Film Festival. Many years later, Jacob the Liar was reincarnated as a Hollywood film – a rather poor one – starring Robin Williams.

In 1977, a year before he left the German Democratic Republic for good, Becker was asked to contribute a series of essays on Jewish identity to be broadcast on South German Radio in Stuttgart. Three years earlier, he had written his third novel, The Boxer, his most autobiographical one, chronicling the life of a Holocaust survivor from 1945 to the 1970s.

Becker's essays were, to put it mildly, controversial. He expressed ambivalence toward his Jewishness and, in keeping with a 1975 United Nations resolution sponsored by the Arabs, rejected Zionism as a form of racism. Twenty years later, about a year before his death, he withdrew his comments about Zionism as "exaggerated and false."

Becker spent almost a month in Israel in 1984, travelling incognito with his wife. There he realized there was a lot more to being Jewish than being a "victim of fascism."

Upon his return, he attended the first of what became an annual German-Israeli Writers' conference. He also began writing a new novel about the children of Holocaust survivors, Bronstein's Children, which was adapted as a movie.

By then, Becker had already written the script for David, a film based on the life of a German Jew who been driven out of Germany by the Nazis. He had also been elected to the West German Academy of Language and Literature in Darmstadt, and had started teaching a course in German literature at Oberlin College in the United States.

"American Germanists saw in Becker the perfect German writer: a Jew, a survivor, a dissident and an author of successful books and films that crossed national boundaries," Gilman observes.

After moving to West Germany, Becker lived in West Berlin, where he was something of a celebrity. There he functioned as a specialist on Jewish developments in the German Democratic Republic. But this role rankled him. "I have suddenly found myself forced to feel as a Jew, something that had played almost no role in my life in the GDR… More often than not, I find expressions of anti-Semitism aimed generally in my direction."

In the wake of Germany's reunification in 1990, Becker was troubled by the resurgence of neo-Nazi violence. "I am afraid," he admitted. "I demand to be protected. And if the state denies me protection, then I shall have to live elsewhere."

In 1995, after returning from a lecture tour of South America, he was diagnosed with advanced rectal cancer. He underwent surgery, but the cancer had metastasized into the liver. More aggressive treatment was required and Becker submitted to a regimen of chemotherapy, but to no avail.

A month before he died, he gave his final press interview. He recognized that Jacob the Liar would be his principal legacy. He acknowledged that his Jewish background had been an intrinsic part of what he was and did. He affirmed the importance of family. He defined himself as a "new" German, anchored in a multicultural past as a foreigner, Jew, socialist, dissident, East German, West Berliner and, finally, a German.

Mission participants walk in the footsteps of Jewish history

UJA trip to Djerba and Paris offers a unique look at Jewish life

UJA Federation's recent mission to Djerba, organized by the Board of Jewish Education, offered participants exposure to the world's oldest existing Jewish community. Despite past persecution and deadly terror attacks against Djerba's historic main synagogue in 1985 and 2002, the Jewish community, although small, is still vibrant. In this edition of Perspective, participant Robert Cohen, a Toronto lawyer, provides his personal look at the Djerba experience. Next week, Dr. Seymour Epstein examines the Paris portion of the mission.

By ROBERT COHEN
UJA Federation

Djerba, an island off the coast of Tunisia, is the home of a Jewish community that has been there for 2000 years. Its exact origins are somewhat clouded between First and Second Temple dispersion times, but according to tradition, the foundation of Djerba's historic El Ghriba Synagogue contains stones from the First Temple and the gate of the Second Temple.

The Jewish community of Djerba numbers approximately 1000, located primarily in two cities on the island. Although its population has been larger in the past, its present population is stable and growing with a family birth rate of six or seven children, and families that are choosing, with some small attrition, to remain in Djerba.

They are not Sephardim or Ashkenazim - they are "Djerban" and fiercely protective of their identities. The community is homogenous - all observant, with no concept of secularism (and certainly not our traditions of Orthodox/Conservative/Reform).

We spent the better part of a day at a girl's school established many years ago by Rabbi David Kiddushim and his wife. We asked the classroom of older girls what they aspired to and were advised that they aspired to marry at 18 and raise their families. Our group, educated in North American feminist values was, to some extent, shocked. It was explained to us, however, that we could not impose our values on this society. Nothing could be of higher value than raising and educating their children.

They were not necessarily sheltered from the world - they had satellite dishes on their roofs, access to the Internet, DVDs and other attributes of western culture - but they were more comfortable with their culture and their value system.

The boys are not as educated in Hebrew, but more involved in Talmud study in the yeshivot. Their texts are Hebrew and Arabic. When they study Torah, they learn it with cantillation (musical notes) - so a significant portion of male society serves as Torah readers in Djerban synagogues - which are traditional, with no women's sections.

Djerban Jews, who are for the most part, financially successful, have a strong connection to Israel - although Israel is not something that is discussed. They live in an Arab country that respects its Jews and hates Israel, and does not see this as contradictory.

When we asked whether the Jews of Djerba have a problem with "fundamentalist" Islam, we were told that the Muslims of Tunisia consider themselves fundamentalist and the true interpreters of the Koran. What the world refers to as fundamentalist, they consider extremists who are not encouraged in their society.

Throughout our Djerban visit, we were royally welcomed and exposed to something very different and so beautiful that we are still reflecting on those experiences.

UJA Federation in our nation's capital

Twenty five UJA Federation volunteers recently participated in the Ottawa Fly-In, one motivational and educational lesson in advocacy arranged for UJA Federation by the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC). The trip - chaired by Michael Levitt and Dan Rabinovitch - allowed participants to see the House of Commons in action and hear from Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, and Canada's Minister of Public Safety, Stockwell Day.

The group also met with representatives from the Department of Foreign Affairs who deal with the Middle East, and visited a special exhibit on Petra at the Museum of Civilization.

Truly a ride to remember

Being cheered by legions of adoring fans isn't a regular occurrence for members of Yidden On Wheels (YOW), a Toronto-based Jewish motorcycle club.

But on a recent journey, almost 400 YOWies, who were helped out in the final leg of a 1,400 kilometre journey by a police escort comprised of 15 patrol cars and, fittingly, four police motorcycles, were greeted by enthusiastic supporters as they zoomed onto the premises of Whitwell Middle School in Tennessee.

Tucked away in a remote community made up almost exclusively of white, southern Baptists, this small-town school is the unlikely home to a Holocaust education project that's garnered international acclaim, and is the subject of the film Paper Clips, which was sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto at the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Through the school project, students collected six million paper clips, an effort to understand the sheer magnitude of how many Jewish souls were murdered by the Nazis.

Almost one-quarter of those who made their way to Whitwell were from Toronto, and many were first inspired by a showing of Paper Clips during last November's Holocaust Education Week, sponsored by UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto.

"What I got out of this was the pleasure of telling the students how remarkable they are for doing this project," says Sid Rochwerg, co-chair of the trip entitled, Paper Clip Ride To Remember, along with Steven Stein. "The school's mandate was to educate the students about the Holocaust and tolerance, but they've gone way beyond that. They're educating the world."

The two-day trek in May from Toronto to Whitwell included nearly 250 motorcycles and 400 people, hailing not just from Toronto, but also places such as Boston, New York and even Australia. Participants from Toronto ranged in age from eleven to those in their eighties, including Rochwerg's father-in-law, Jack Sylman, 82, a Holocaust survivor, and his wife Lola.

Stein called it "the largest assemblage of Jewish motorcyclists ever."

While paying tribute to the school was their main goal, the riders also raised $40,000, which helped purchase almost a dozen high-tech teaching aids for the school and also assisted the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Moriah Films division.

"We told school principal Linda Hooper that in light of what you've done, we want to do something for you, so we raised money for the school," says Stein. "And since films serve as a primary means of Holocaust education… what better way to serve this project than support Moriah Films."

New Jewish campuses respond to challenges identified in recent study

Survey profiles community members on margins of Jewish life

By CARLA LANCIT

Danielle Reich is among those who believe that the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus on Bathurst Street north of Rutherford Road will bring York Region's Jewish community closer together, and closer still to a more complete Jewish life. She, her husband Jamie, and their two young children live in Thornhill Woods, a stone's throw from the 50-acre campus, a UJA Federation Tomorrow Campaign project.

"We're looking forward to it," she says. "We're not a member of any synagogue, or any community organization—this will give us the incentive to be more active," says Reich, who is planning to investigate children's programs with Jewish content, fitness activities and perhaps a lecture series for herself. Reich typifies a significant number of Jews in the Greater Toronto Area who, according to a recent UJA Federation study, are more removed from Jewish life than those who live in areas with a larger number of Jewish programs and services.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is responding to the challenges outlined in the survey through the Tomorrow Campaign, which is building new campuses for Jewish life downtown, in the Bathurst-Sheppard area and in York Region.

"The physical structures and the programs that will take place in those structures on the campuses are revitalizing Jewish life," says UJA Federation of Greater Toronto president and CEO Ted Sokolsky. "We are creating new portals of Jewish life and now we have to develop new methods of engagement. Clearly we have to get involved in grassroots Jewish life in non-traditional Jewish areas."

The Lebovic campus, for example, will house schools, family and social services, fitness and conference facilities and large amounts of green space to address the needs of the more than 60,000 Jews living in York Region.

For Debbie Starr, the Lebovic campus holds the promise of a fuller Jewish life for her four children, aged 12 to 20. "I hope that it will encourage them to get active in some way," she says. "Even if it's just playing hockey with other Jewish kids."

At the other end of the GTA, the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (MNJCC) – the centerpiece of the downtown campus - serves 21,000 Jews who live in the city core and nearly 5,000 downtown Jewish students through the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto.

For many, the MNJCC serves as an entry point to the Jewish community by offering a wide array of programming as well as its state-of-the-art workout facilities.

Frances Enchin was on a stationary bike in the MNJCC gym last week when she overheard two people discussing a Yiddish expression. "I said, 'you wouldn't have this conversation at a commercial gym.'"

This feeling of community contributed, in fact, to Enchin's decision to continue living downtown after having children. "There are plenty of places to go," she says, "but this is where I want to hang my hat."

"We're creating new Jewish life in places where there is currently little Jewish life," says Sokolsky. "The new campuses for Jewish life across the GTA will be magnets for members of the Jewish community. Given the opportunity, people will gravitate toward these magnets."

Eilat/Eilot honours Toronto

During the recently concluded UJA Federation Prime Minister's Mission, a special dedication ceremony was held in honour of the new Toronto Circle on the main road to Eilat. The circle was dedicated to Toronto because of UJA Federation's long-standing partnership with Eilat and the surrounding Eilot region. Pictured below, dancers at the dedication ceremony are recent graduates of a UJA Federation-supported after-school program for youth at risk in Eilat.

Pillsbury heiress takes philanthropy to the next level

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

Giving away one's money is more difficult than spending it, because quiet simply, money doesn't come with directions, according to a woman who knows.

Tracy Gary, heiress to the Pillsbury fortune, a donor activist and philanthropic advisor from the United States made her remarks during a two-day series of Toronto forums sponsored by three of Canada's most successful organizations - The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, UJA Federation's endowment arm, the Toronto Community Foundation, and Philanthropic Foundations Canada, a membership organization for foundation leadership.

Author of Inspired Philanthropy, a work book designed to help philanthropists with their giving, Gary has served on 30 boards of directors and has worked with a number of donors, families and foundations to develop statements of purpose and guidelines for their giving. Gary was introduced to the importance of giving back at an early age when her great grandfather, who invented the dial telephone, once told her that "you must do something for the city, country and community you live in."

"Tracy Gary obviously stands by what she believes," says Carol Kassel, vice president, Planned Giving and Endowments, Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. "She is adamant that collaboration is essential in the role of successful philanthropy and, here she is, sharing with others her secrets and vast wealth of knowledge about philanthropy. Tracy possesses the gift of inspiring and motivating others to get involved in more rewarding philanthropic work, and that's something that ultimately benefits us all."

According to Gary, with a huge transfer of wealth expected over the next 25 years, substantially increasing philanthropy is vital for the success of charitable foundations.

Gary, who began her philanthropic journey during her early twenties, believes that educating donors about the importance of and sense of satisfaction from developing a giving plan that continues to be implemented after death – is essential. At the afternoon session of the Family Philanthropy Forum, Gary said that philanthropy at its best is very intentional. Whether it's $1 or $1 million, its about being committed and thoughtful to a strategic philanthropic goal.

The big question, says Gary, is "what is it that you want to share or preserve after your lifetime?"

"In the United States, 90 percent of all people give to charity but less than 20 percent of them give at the time of their death," she says. "Legacy planning can be done in stages and does not have to be done alone – it's really just another way of dreaming about the future you want. If you only wait until death [to give], there's a lot of fun that you'll have missed because when you give, you are living with a greater purpose."

Artists join fight to end domestic violence

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A group of about 18 female Canadian visual artists have come together to help in the fight to end violence against women.

In an art show titled "Toronto Caring Hands Artists' Initiative" (TCHAI), to be held at the Papermill Gallery at Todmorden Mills, 67 Pottery Rd., from June 20 to July 2, the women will be selling some of their work to raise money for Jewish Women International of Canada (JWI/C), whose mission is to help end violence against women.

Four honorary patron artists – Doris McCarthy, Helen Lucas, Charles Pachter and Ian Leventhal – have also joined the cause.

Artist Harriet Liebmann says the seeds for the show were planted about two years ago at a meeting of JWI's Golda Meir chapter, when she and two other artists, Judith Sinclair and Lilli Gillman, decided to do a three-women show at the Papermill Gallery to raise money for the chapter.

"We realized that the gallery had 360 linear feet of wall space available and we decided to invite other artists, selected by a jury, to join the show," Liebmann says.

Each artist was asked to bring forward the names of at least 50 people to be invited to the opening and to participate in fundraising, she says.

"These artists have helped raise an enormous amount of money, and we now have 2,000 people on the invitation list for the June 20 opening."

Money raised from the show will help finance the distribution of "When Push Comes to Shove… It's No Longer Love," interactive multi-media workshops specifically designed to alert teenagers to the signs of abuse and to help them understand the social implications of violence.

TCHAI's goal is to raise $50,000, which could help more than 50,000 students across Canada to benefit from the program, Liebmann says.

"It is something that is pro-active. Education and awareness are important at this level – just when teens are starting to date. We want to get this on [the students'] agenda."

Penny Krowitz, executive director of JWI Canada, says the three women visited every artist's studio and met each one before making the selection.

"They also brought sponsor Gabor Szekely [on board], who provided seed money to ensure the project would run."

Liebmann says the project could be "one of the most important artists' initiative in the history of the city. These artists are taking their work – sculptures, florals, still lifes and abstracts – and using it to raise awareness and funds.

"Raising money for this cause is important for the safety of young girls. It could change their lives, and it could even save their lives."

Artists participating in the show – each will contribute about six or seven pieces and donate part of the money to JWI/C – include Eleanor Besen, Bina Cole, Sheila Shapiro Denaburg, Ruth Frankel, Filomena N. Gasparro, Lilli Gillman, Elaine Clarfield Gitalis, Edie Harlang, Lila Lewis Irving, Harriet Liebmann, Patience Morrisey, Gloria Robins, Jill Segal, Kati Siklos, Judith Sinclair, Abbey Smith and Linda Cherry Soudack.

Krowitz says each of the artists has also donated a piece of art, which will be part of a raffle.

Artists will be selling works of art for charity at the art show to fund JWI's program. Inset: Harriet Liebmann

The two-week art show is running Tuesday to Friday 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. and noon to 5 p.m. on Sunday.

The June 20 opening and June 29 closing are by invitation only.

Aging not a problem but a privilege, doctor says

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

Memory does not get worse as we age, but our memory functions differently, says Dr. Guy Proulx.

In fact, while 20-year-olds use one particular area of the brain to solve a problem, 70-year-olds use a completely different part of the brain to perform the same task, said Proulx, Baycrest's director of psychology and neuro-rehabilitation.

It is important to talk about the fear that many adults have about changing memory abilities, Proulx told the audience of some 250, almost all seniors and baby boomers, at a recent lecture at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

A lot of that fear, he said, comes from ignorance about the true face of aging.

Proulx's talk, sponsored by the synagogue's sisterhood, countered that ignorance by debunking popular myths about growing older.

It is true that memory changes as we get older, but there is a large difference between normal memory changes and changes to be concerned about, he said. The majority of elderly people do not have brain function diseases.

"If you forget the name of someone you see only once in awhile, that is a normal memory change. But if you forget the name of a close family member, that is a problem."

The same goes for repeating a comment or question a few hours after you've said it: if you repeat a question immediately after asking it, there is cause for concern.

Since one-quarter of Canadians will be seniors in 20 years, the elderly agenda will become an increasingly significant national issue, Proulx said.

He personally believes that aging is not a problem, but a privilege. He showed a painting by Group of Seven artist Tom Thomson depicting a beautiful Canadian autumn. "Autumn is the most glorious season in Canada, and in life," Proulx told his audience.

In order to paint aging in a better light, Proulx demonstrated that the senior population is in fact the most diverse demographic in Canada.

"Many believe that most of the over-85 crowd have dementia. True, 35 per cent does have dementia, but we need to learn from the 65 per cent that does not," he said.

One prevalent myth is that we lose all our skills as we age. Proulx explained that once older people begin to use new areas of the brain, they gain new skills.

"Global pattern recognition is our new skill. Young people can be too focused," he said.

"A 70-year-old reading to a child will remember the story she read better than a 29-year-old will, since the 70-year-old has more of an emotional association with reading to the child."

Aging is viewed as a negative part of life by western society, but in truth, as you age, "you gain in certain areas, lose in others and stay stable in some skills," Proulx said.

"Yes, motor reaction and speed go down with age, but intelligence and knowledge go up."

Life can be easier in other ways, too. Proulx described his 22-year-old son currently grappling with substantial worries about the future: finding a graduate school to attend, a career to pursue and a woman to marry.

"This stress does not have a bearing on older people like us, since we experience more stability and have fewer concerns because major decisions have already been made," Proulx said.

In light of this fact, he added, it is not surprising that the age demographic most satisfied with life is the 65-plus group. The myth that life gets worse as we get older is inaccurate and one we need to fight.

Another advantage is that most of us become much better at regulating emotions and at dumping negative feelings, he said. Older people are much more willing to compromise. Young people are absolutist, wanting black and white solutions to their problems.

Proulx also likened an older mind that works more slowly than it once did to a vast library: "The more your library grows, you get a little slower retrieving information. But who says slower is bad?

"The more knowledge you acquire with age, the richer your consciousness becomes," he noted.

Canadians need to stop worrying about normal aging and start battling abnormal aging. "Type 2 diabetes, obesity and smoking are some factors that increase the risk for vascular and Alzheimer dementias.

"You are never too young or too old to start being active and eating well to prevent dementia," Proulx stressed. "The good news is, studies are showing that a regular walking program can dramatically reduce the danger for vascular dementia."

The secret to avoiding abnormal aging is prevention, he said. "It's very low-tech: eat well, stay healthy and dump the stress."

Message sent, message received

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Shavuot is an anniversary that celebrates the delivery of the greatest message ever: God's instructions to, and expectations of, humanity – the Torah. While the spectacular delivery of this message was witnessed by an entire nation at the foot of Mount Sinai, the divine message itself was transmitted through the medium of Moshe Rabbeinu. He received the message, but more importantly, he was given the task of communicating it to the masses.

What is most fascinating is that Moses was challenged with a lifelong speech impediment, one so severe that God himself advised Moses that his brother Aaron should speak for him before Pharoah.

One remembers Moses' reluctance to accept God's command in taking the people out of Egypt. "I am not a man of words. I am heavy of mouth and heavy of speech." While some commentators understand this refusal as Moses feeling he was no longer fluent in the language of a nation he had left a long time before, most understand it simply as Moses saying he was not a silver-tongued orator. In fact, he had difficulty pronouncing even basic words and sounds.

So why did God again choose someone like Moses, with all his wonderful qualities, to communicate such an important message as the Torah when he simply could not?

Before answering this, I'd like to tell you a story. In prewar Poland, the Polish Parliament considered an accreditation system for all teachers. Since this new law would have a disastrous effect on the yeshivot of Poland, whose teachers most certainly could not meet these secular standards, the Chofetz Chaim himself attempted to intercede. Standing before officials from the ministry of education, he delivered an impassioned plea, even sobbing at times. When the Chofetz Chaim paused to regain his composure, an interpreter offered to translate his Yiddish words. "No need," said the minister. "I understand what the old rabbi wants."

All pieces of communication have two components: content and delivery. One without the other, or too much of one and too little of the other, means the message won't get fully delivered. If a person has dazzling eloquence but little to say, not much is being said, even if it's being said beautifully! Conversely, if you have a great message but no skill in delivering it, then the message, as valuable as it may be, will either be misunderstood or not delivered at all.

In the case of the Chofetz Chaim, the ministry officials did not understand a single word he said, yet they were moved by the sincerity of the saintly Chofetz Chaim.

God specifically chose Moses for his total lack of communication skills. The Torah was so important that the message had to stand on its own merit. Anything but the raw power of the Torah itself would actually diminish it. There could be no flourish of language or persuasion of personality, and there was no place for charisma or oratory. The transmission of the Torah in its purest form was so important that nothing could embellish it, for any embellishment would be to its very detriment.

In today's world of media hyper-sophistication and an ever-shrinking public attention span, public speakers better make sure they have something to say and that it be polished to a shine before they get up to speak.

Curious Jews

Guest Voice

By RABBI ADIN STEINSALTZ

For most people, the act of studying stops abruptly at the end of formal schooling, whether after elementary school, high school or college.

It isn't that they don't learn anymore once their schooling is over. They have lots of experiences, and hopefully they learn something from them. If they live in a large city, they may have all kinds of lectures to choose from, and perhaps they go, and even go again, if a subject interests them. But few adults sit down and study in a continuous, disciplined way. They find no compelling need or motivation.

Curiosity is a characteristic of youth. Other primates abandon curiosity relatively early in order to deal with the problems of daily living – finding food, rearing offspring – but the prolonged childhood of humans gives them the opportunity to spend more time cultivating their curiosity.

Many educational systems don't understand this. They try to make every subject of study "relevant," and that's a big mistake. Teachers, and sometimes parents, think this enhances the desire and inclination to learn, but it actually destroys curiosity, which is what is most important. Being interested in irrelevant things – things that have no immediate or even remote relevance to our existence – is part of our uniqueness as humans.

In his book on popular physics, Leopold Infeld describes the earliest experiments with electricity. You can do them yourself. Take a piece of glass and rub it with silk, and you get electricity. Or, take a piece of amber and rub it with flannel. You also get electricity, but of a different kind: one is positive, and one is negative.

Now, what would most people do with those things? They would use the glass as a paperweight. They would put the amber on a shelf as an ornament. They would use the flannel to clean their shoes, and the silk to wipe their nose.

So how did we go from static electricity to computers – from the Greek philosopher Thales (who first described creating static electricity by rubbing glass with silk 2,500 years ago) to Apple Computer founder Steve Jobs tinkering in his parents' garage? These people were curious. They had time on their hands, and they had stuff to play with. They played to satisfy their curiosity, and they saw something interesting.

When a school tries to make everything relevant and utilitarian, it's helpful in some ways, but it kills the basic notion of curiosity. In some realms of knowledge, it's fine to ask what good something is, to see if it gives a practical answer to a practical problem. But sometimes I want to find out about what it is. One might even say that it's the lack of continuous curiosity that slows human advancement.

Observant Jews are obligated to study Torah simply to study Torah. This is unusual. Most religions have expectations about belief and about doing the right things, but they don't obligate you to study. Jews, however, study Torah as an activity that is not directly connected with belief or action. In fact, the most studied books in Jewish life, such as the Talmud, are ones with very little practical use.

So why do people study the laws of rare things that happened in remote times, or things the Talmud says never happened and never will happen? We do because we are seeking knowledge for itself, not as something to be used. Not everyone has the same level of active curiosity, but study is encouraged and done as an obligation.

Why does God want us to study? Theologically, it's a way to commune with Him. The ability to study for the sake of study is one of the very true human traits that make us, in a certain way, higher than angels. The angels don't seem to have any curiosity; they know everything. And animals learn only what they need to live. The only beings who are curious about anything are people.

This notion has always been powerful in Jewish life, and it has pushed some people to very high intellectual levels. When Isidor Rabi, who won the Nobel Prize for physics in 1944, was asked what he attributed his prize and his great achievements to, he said his parents. When he came home from school, they never asked him what he learned. Rather, they wanted to know, "Did you ask a good question today?"

The Jewish approach to learning seems to have been ingrained very early and very deeply. Hecataeus, a Greek geographer during the reign of Alexander the Great, wrote about remote countries that were beginning to be known at the time. He said he had heard of an interesting nation south of Syria. All its inhabitants were philosophers – that is, people who ask idle questions and are interested in wisdom for wisdom's sake. That's a very nice statement about our people.

On the upcoming holiday of Shavuot, we celebrate receiving the Torah. We do not dance and sing with it, as we do on Simchat Torah. Rather, alone or together, we sit and we study – whatever text or topic we choose – just to learn and to connect with God.

Christians respect and admire Judaism

A Dictionary of Jewish-Christian Relations*, edited by Edward Kessler and Neil Wenborn, Cambridge University Press.

Books
Bernard Baskin

This A-to-Z companion to 2,000 years of encounter between Judaism and Christianity is the most comprehensive dictionary ever compiled on the relations between the two religions. It contains over 700 entries, contributed by more than 100 internationally renowned scholars.

It addresses not only the theological but also the philosophical, historical, sociological and political dimensions of the ongoing encounter between Judaism and Christianity.

In a helpful preface to the book, the two editors point out that it was the impact of the Holocaust, the creation of the State of Israel, the development of the ecumenical movement and the work of the Second Vatican council (1962 to '65) that in combination made the changes in attitude more widespread.

As a result, Christianity, so long an instigator of violence against Jews, rediscovered a respect and admiration for Judaism, and the once-close relationship, which had become a distant memory, has been to a large extent restored.

The editors write, "The efforts of Catholics and Protestants towards respect for Judaism project attitudes that would have been unthinkable a few decades ago. Christian theology has been profoundly revised at the official level: all Churches are now committed to the fight against anti-Semitism, and the vast majority are actively committed to teaching about the Jewishness of Jesus, and the problem of mission to Jews has been significantly reduced."

• Noahide Laws – The Genesis account portrays Noah as a pious believer in God who worshipped him through obedience and sacrifice and was given divine commands, including those prohibiting murder and the consumption of blood. He is therefore seen by Judaism, Christianity and Islam as one of antiquity's righteous personalities and a prototype of simple religiosity vis-a-vis God, humanity and animals.

Accordingly, non-Jewish men and women are to be defined and treated as monotheists if they establish courts of law, refrain from blasphemy, idolatry, murder, theft and forbidden sexual relationships such as incest, and do not perform vivisection. They are then regarded by rabbinic codifiers (e.g. Maimonides) as "the pious of the gentile peoples" and worthy of the same eternal bliss guaranteed to Jews who observe the Torah's 613 commands.

• Oliver Cromwell (1599-1658) – Cromwell was the person most responsible for the readmission of the Jews to England in 1656, following their expulsion in 1290. He had been petitioned by the Dutch Rabbi Menasseh ben Israel, who saw England as a potential haven for Jews suffering widespread massacres in Ukraine. Cromwell convened a conference in London in December 1655 to decide the issue. Those favouring re-admission argued that the messianic age would dawn once the Jews were scattered to the four corners of the world, which necessitated entry to England.

When the conference failed to deliver a positive response, Cromwell dissolved it. Three months later, a group of Marranos living in London and posing as Catholics openly professed their Jewish identity and petitioned Cromwell to allow them to establish a synagogue and cemetery. He gave his consent. This decision was one of few acts of Cromwell not automatically repealed on the restoration of the monarchy.

• Canada – The United Church of Canada, the largest Protestant body in Canada, published in 1997 an important document called Bearing Faithful Witness. It called for repentance for theological anti-Judaism and political anti-Semitism and was hailed as a watershed in its acknowledgment that "the church's rejection of Jews was an act of disobedience to God." It proposed guidelines for Christians in their relationship with Jews and Judaism, stating that "the hope of Israel is the Christian hope, too: Earth under God's rule in peace, prosperity and justice for all."

The holiday all-nighter

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On Thursday night, the first night of Shavuot, tens of thousands of Jews around the world will be burning the midnight oil.

They will be staying up all night and learning Torah until daybreak as part of the Tikkun Leil Shavuot tradition, a tradition with mystical roots and modern adaptations.

Why an all-nighter? Shavuot, of course, is the festival during which we commemorate the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai. As the Orthodox Union site explains, "The midrash tells us that some of the People of Israel slept on the night before Matan Torah and God had to awaken them in order to give them the Torah. Our sages do not fault them for sleeping – they were exhausted from their travels. However, a custom developed to spend the night prior to Matan Torah immersed in Torah study." [http://tinyurl.com/nc5g2]

Eliezer Segal writes that the earliest mention of the tradition dates to the 13th century in which the kabbalistic book, the Zohar, tells of the all-night study session held by Rabbi Shimeon bar Yochai more than a thousand years earlier. "Rabbi Shimeon's Tikkun was not so much an educational event as a mystical rite. In the Zohar's rich symbolism, Shavuot, the anniversary of the revelation at Mount Sinai, is depicted as a metaphysical wedding of the male and female aspects of the divine." [http://tinyurl.com/lwbfb]

Leslie Koppelman Ross adds that "in addition to wanting to compensate for the Israelites, the mystics had the idea that at midnight the heavens open and favourably receive the thoughts, study, and prayers of those who remain awake on the anniversary of the Revelation." [http://tinyurl.com/nnb2v]

Traditionally on that evening, people would read from a volume called "Tikkun Leil Shavuot" that would include a selection from every book in the Torah, the Prophets, the Writings as well as from the Oral Law, the Mishnah. That is followed by a listing of the 613 mitzvot and a brief selection from the kabbalistic work, the Zohar. [http://tinyurl.com/r4wde]

Nowadays, many Tikkun Leil Shavuot participants prefer to study, discuss and debate other Jewish issues during their night of learning. The Union for Reform Judaism has created three 64-page study booklets for the evening, which can be downloaded free from the union's website:

• Journeying Toward Sinai contains eight workshops including "Revelatory Stories: What Allows for God's Appearance?" and "From Ancient Texts to Modern Teachings: Ruth and the Complicated Art of Parenting";

• Together at Sinai includes preparing for a Shavuot seder and "Finding Your Own Personal Torah: A Participatory Exercise";

• Aseret Hadibrot: Illuminating the Ten Commandments contains "Broken Tablets: Restoring the Commandments and Ourselves" and "God Revealed at Sinai: Cecil B. Demille and Modern Midrash." [http://urj.org/holidays/shavuot/tikkun/]

Meanwhile, in All-Night Learning for Shavuot: You Can Do It!, Esther Kustanowitz provides tips for weary teens who want to stay but are fighting drooping eyelids. One suggestion: relive the moment. Have someone read aloud the account of the giving of the Torah while picturing the "excitement of standing at the base of Mount Sinai… Imagine an ancient version of your contemporary self there." [http://learn.jtsa.edu/shavuot/latenight.shtml]

It probably wasn't what the kabbalistic mystics had in mind but thanks to Tikkun Leil Shavuot, the holiday has become "a little bit hip." The Jewish Telegraphic Agency reports that young Jews who have never had a connection to the holiday have been attending all-night study and cultural extravaganzas such as the one at New York's 92nd Street Y. [http://tinyurl.com/heryv]

But can things get too hip? At a recent Tikkun Leil Shavuot in Tel Aviv, only five of the 15 lectures were related to Jewish sources. Poet and writer Benjamin Shvili told Ha'aretz that "the events in Tel Aviv may represent some degree of censorship of the original Jewish festival that this holiday was. On the other hand, it's the time of the giving of the Torah – who knows where the Torah begins and where it ends? Who says that receiving the Torah is only the Tanach [the Jewish Bible]? We are coming to study." [http://tinyurl.com/g9oqf]

Bridge tournament raises funds for ovarian cancer research

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Mindy Kirsh died three years ago, after a battle with ovarian cancer. Since she was an avid bridge player, it was only natural that when her good friends Anita Gertin, Joanna Slone and Taube Zeifman wanted to honour her, they chose bridge.

Early last month, more than 400 people attended the third annual Mindy Kirsh Memorial Bridge to the Cure bridge and mah-jong luncheon at the Spirale Banquet and Conference Centre.

The event, which raised more than $80,000 for ovarian cancer research at Princess Margaret Hospital, included a silent auction, a raffle draw, duplicate and social bridge and mah-jong.

Vida Seif and Daniel Bernstein, and Lynne Beisswenger and Allyne Alderman won the duplicate bridge tournament.

Guest speaker was Joan Murphy, division head of Gynecologic Oncology and the University Health Network and associate professor at the University of Toronto. She was Kirsh's physician.

Murphy called Kirsh a "special patient who enriched my life."

Beating ovarian cancer, she said, will take an interdisciplinary team of physicians, patients and researchers.

"Together I know that we will find a cure for 'the disease that whispers,'" she said. (Ovarian cancer is referred to as the disease that whispers because there are few, if any, symptoms. By the time there are symptoms, it is frequently too late to do much to help.)

In an interview after the luncheon, Murphy said that although the average risk of getting ovarian cancer is one in 70, for many Jewish women it is 25 to 40 per cent higher.

Taube Zeifman, Anita Gertin & Joanna Slone, co-chairs of the event

"This is because one in 50 Ashkenazi Jewish women has a mutation in the BRCA1 and BRCA2 genes, which makes them at higher risk for not just ovarian and breast cancer but cancer of the fallopian tubes as well," Murphy said.

Part of the problem in dealing with this disease, said Murphy, is that there is no good screening test available. There is ultrasound examination, and a blood test for CA125, a tumour marker often found in the most common forms of the disease, but "we have very little confidence in them being definitive."

The focus, then, she said, has to be on prevention. That may entail surgical removal of the ovaries and fallopian tubes if someone either has the gene mutations themselves, or has a family history of ovarian cancer.

Men can also pass on the gene and can themselves suffer from breast or prostate cancer, Murphy said.

Princess Margaret Hospital genetics counsellor Amy Finch acknowledged the severe emotional effects of finding out that you have either a family history or the gene mutation.

"That's why counselling, and tapping into medical expertise, is so important," she said.

Teaching was a 'passion' for longtime educator

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Brenda Freedman, a longtime and highly respected English teacher at Bnei Akiva Schools, died last month after a long battle with cancer. She was 67.

Born in Toronto, she was educated at Harbord Collegiate, Forest Hill Collegiate, the University of Toronto, and the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education. She began her teaching career at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute, where she taught for four years.

Brenda Freedman

Freedman and her late husband, Murray, spent two years in Israel and then one in Buffalo while he did post-doctoral fellowships at the Weizmann Institute and at Roswell Park Cancer Research Institute.

In 1975, she joined the staff at Bnei Akiva schools, first at Ulpanat Orot and then at Or Chaim as well. For many years, she was head of the schools' English department. Freedman only left in 2005 because of her illness.

Her brother, Martin Lockshin, a professor at York University, said that teaching was "a passion" for her. "She thought creatively, inventing plays and projects for the students, rather than just lecturing."

He said she was very tuned in to new developments in teaching methodology and philosophy, and incorporated them into her own classroom.

One responsibility Freedman enjoyed a great deal was being a host teacher for student teachers, he said.

Joanna Stavsky, now a teacher herself, was a student of Freedman's for several of her years at Ulpanat Orot. She said that she treasured the advice and mentoring that Freedman gave to her freely and enthusiastically.

Freedman made frequent trips to Israel, during which she made it a habit to treat her former students who were studying there to an evening out.

She was very close to her family, Lockshin said, and not only to her immediate family, but to the extended Lockshin clan. "She put together a family reunion that brought people from all over North America," he recalled.

She was an avid reader, he said. "She didn't just read, she consumed books – and remembered what she had read."

Freedman was active in several organizations, especially Hadassah-WIZO and Beth Tzedec Congregation's Little Minyan. She was also on the committee for the Jewish Book Awards.

Freedman was predeceased by her husband Murray. She is survived by her children Benjy and Anita Freedman and Malka and John Regan; her mother Sylvia Lockshin; sister Sherryn and her husband Eric Lang, her brother Martin and his wife Ruth; three grandchildren, nieces and nephews; and her close friend Sol Messinger.

Send troops to Darfur, retired general urges

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Retired Canadian general Romeo Dallaire witnessed the 1994 genocide in Rwanda first hand, and he doesn't mince words when it comes to whether Canada should send troops to Sudan's Darfur region.

"As we look at Darfur today, we have actually been taking decisions on which human beings deserve to live and which don't," Dallaire told a May 16 event at Ottawa's Agudath Israel Synagogue jointly sponsored by Ottawa Hadassah-WIZO and the Canadian Mental Health Association's Ottawa branch.

"How much of a price are we prepared to pay? If this nation does not have the depth of maturity to handle it, we should stay within our borders and shut up."

Referring to what some have called the genocide currently taking place in Darfur, Dallaire, who is now a senator, reminded the 250 people in attendance that "far-off complex problems are not that far off, because in the background is international terrorism."

He added: "There is no more magnificent time for Canadians to serve in uniform than now because the missions are just."

Dallaire's book, Shake Hands with the Devil: The Failure of Humanity in Rwanda, is his story of the Rwandan genocide of 1994, when 900,000 Tutsis were murdered by Hutu extremists while he, as commander of the United Nations Assistance Mission for Rwanda, urged the world to intervene.

"Expecting a problem was part of our plan, but expecting a genocide was not," said Dallaire, a decorated soldier who is recognized internationally as an advocate of peacemaking, peacekeeping and peace building. "It took a week for me to come to the conclusion that we were facing a genocide. It was impossible to imagine that a holocaust would happen again, but it did."

He described his vain efforts to convince world powers to send troops to stop the massacre.

"Six weeks into the genocide, the [UN] Security Council finally agreed it was a genocide, and so, on the 17th of May, they agreed to my plan to stop it."

But help was not quick to arrive.

Senator Romeo Dallaire

"Two months later – one month after the end of the genocide, one month after the civil war – the first troops arrived, and they were from Ethiopia."

Dallaire described his frustration and despair as he witnessed the mass murders and as he begged and pleaded for someone to step in to save the lives of the innocent.

"We watched… The journalists were there, but the stories never made it to the screen. ABC, CBS and NBC put more time on [figure skater] Tonya Harding knee-capping her opposition and O.J. Simpson's glove than they did on the genocide," he said.

"At the same time as I was asking for help, we were pouring tens of thousands of troops into the former Yugoslavia. Why were we sending people there and not to Rwanda? Was it because they were white and European?"

He asked two things of Canadians: "Once [troops] are committed, that we support them in their missions, and when they come back, that they and their families are treated with dignity and respect."

His experiences in Rwanda deeply affected Dallaire, resulting in ongoing mental health issues, including depression and post-traumatic stress disorder.

"From living through the horrors of Rwanda, it would be understandable if Romeo Dallaire withdrew from public life or became cynical and hard-hearted," said Toby Yan, national vice-president of Hadassah-WIZO.

"The general has done the opposite. While struggling with his own health issues, Romeo Dallaire continues to write and speak out against human rights abuses, genocide and ethnic cleansing, serving as an ethical compass for moral human behaviour. He challenges us to demonstrate our humanity, to see every human soul, whether in Rwanda, Sudan or Canada, as equal in every way."

Proceeds from the evening will be divided between the two sponsoring organizations. Hadassah-WIZO's share will go to the Hadassah Medical Centre in Jerusalem and the Assaf Harofeh Hospital near Tel Aviv.

Wiesel says Iran's leader threatens mankind

Wiesel said Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is the kind of fanatic who threatens mankind.

"How is it possible that a nation accepts this man, who is mad, clinically mad, as a leader?" he said, adding that Ahmadinejad doesn't even attempt to hide his agenda of wiping Israel off the map.

"What about his crazy ambition to become a nuclear [power]?"

But Wiesel said that if we choose to live in a moral society, we must speak up for the persecuted people everywhere, not just for Jews.

He referred to a video address by Tony Comper, president and CEO of BMO Financial Group and the co-founder of FAST, Fighting Anti-Semitism Together. In the address, Comper called on other non-Jews to join Jews in the fight against anti-Semitism.

To this, Wiesel said, "May I respectfully ask my fellow Jews to answer and say, 'We as Jews must fight racism and bigotry and prejudice and misery everywhere, not only among Jews.'

"Wherever communities are in danger, we must come to their aid. Wherever people suffer from persecutions, for any reason, we Jews must say, 'No, persecution is not an option. Humiliation is not an option.'"

Wiesel, a man who lives by the philosophy that the greatest sin is indifference, has spoken out in defence of Soviet Jews, Nicaragua's Miskito Indians, Argentina's "disappeared," Cambodian refugees, Kurds, the victims of the South African apartheid and, most recently, the victims in Darfur.

He said he became involved with the genocide in Darfur after U.S. president Bill Clinton invited him to give the millennium lecture in 2000, titled "Perils of Indifference."

During the question-and-answer period following that talk, a woman from Rwanda asked him about the world's indifference during the 1994 Rwandan genocide.

Wiesel then turned to Clinton and asked him to answer the question.

"We could have saved 600,000 to 800,000 men, women and children in Rwanda. Why didn't we?" Wiesel recalled asking Clinton.

The president admitted his regret and said he had travelled to Rwanda to apologize on his own behalf and that of the United States, and promised that it would not happen again, Wiesel said.

Wiesel said that after his lecture five years ago, he was visited by the a bishop from Sudan who said to him, "You are now the custodian of the presidential pledge," and Wiesel has been involved with the crisis in Darfur ever since.

Although Wiesel believes that indifference is just as damaging as persecution itself, he can understand the helplessness people feel when attempting to fight a phenomenon as widespread as fanaticism, yet he urges people never to give up hope.

"One feels helpless to… comprehend a mother who says publicly on television that she has just given one son, who had become a suicide terrorist, to the cause, but she has four more sons to give. What about her maternal instincts?" he asked.

However, he said that despite the rise in political and religious fanaticism over the years, there have been events in the last century that are promising.

"I went to South Africa in 1975, and if anyone had told me that I would see the end of apartheid, I would not have believed him. In 1989 – the fall of communism, the opening of the gates – if anyone would have told me, when I went to the Soviet Union in 1965, that I would see one million Jews in Israel, Russian Jews, I wouldn't have believed them. I would have said, 'You are crazy, communism is here to stay.'"

But despite these events, hatred is still a worldwide disease that must be conquered, he said.

"Hatred is contagious. I call it an infectious disease. Hatred is like a cancer. It goes from cell to cell, from limb to limb, from person to person, from city to city."

Wiesel said he was embarrassed to admit that after the war in 1945, he was optimistic that if there was one thing he could be sure of, it was that anti-Semitism had perished with the victims in Auschwitz.

"Now we realize that the victims perished, but anti-Semitism is still alive. If Auschwitz hasn't cured the world of anti-Semitism, what can and what will?"

"How do we stop [fanaticism]?" Wiesel asked. "Whatever the answer, education must be its major component. We must put all our energy into education to save ourselves and to save those around us.

"My friends, we must be carriers of hope, for hope is the only option if our humanity wants to justify itself. It depends on us."

Run/walk to raise funds for dystonia research

Fifty-thousand Canadians wake up each morning unable to speak, swallow, blink, eat or walk. They suffer from dystonia, the third most common neurological movement disorder in North America.

Involuntary muscle contractions force the sufferer's body parts into abnormal, and sometimes painful, movements and postures. Vocal cords, eyelids and limbs are among the possible areas affected.

Dystonia, for which there is no cure, is a chronic disorder that afflicts people of both genders and all ages and races.

Toronto plays host to the first-ever Annual Freedom to Move for Dystonia 5K Run/Walk on Sunday, June 4, to raise funds to help discover a cure.

Beginning at 8:30 a.m., participants can sign up at High Park at the corner of Bloor and Keele streets, inside the park's Bloor Street gates. The run kicks off at 10 a.m. and should be an exciting event for the entire family.

Other highlights of the 5K include live entertainment, free healthy snacks, bracelets and T-shirts.

The $30 registration fee paid by each of the run/walk's participants will go to the Dystonia Medical Research Foundation (DMRF) Canada and will aid research as well as provide education and support for dystonia patients and their families.

The foundation was founded in 1976 by Samuel and Frances Belzberg of Vancouver after their daughter was diagnosed with the disorder. This year, the DMRF is celebrating its 30th anniversary.

Palestinian infighting draws media scrutiny

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The intensifying factional strife between Hamas and Fatah security forces in Gaza was the subject of considerable media attention late last month.

Mitch Potter, the Toronto Star's Mideast correspondent, filed several reports from May 18 to 23 about the escalating "power struggle" between supporters of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah and PA Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas.

On May 18, Potter drew a vivid picture of the strife that provided a contradiction to Hamas' avowed aim to establish a calming presence in the area: "In the southern [Gaza] city of Khan Yunis, about 40 members of the new [Hamas security] force broke up a peaceful protest of recent college graduates who want teaching jobs. They bludgeoned protesters with clubs and rifles."

Over the next days, Potter wrote about the escalating violence, including the serious wounding of Tarek Abu Rajab, branch commander of Fatah's Palestinian General Intelligence, who was flown to Tel Aviv for surgery to save his leg.

Fears of civil war mounted, while some Palestinians claimed that it was to be avoided at all costs.

Reporting from Khan Yunis on May 23, Potter described a visit with a cell of the Popular Resistance Committees [PRC] including Muhammed Abu Mujahid, spokesperson for the group's "militant wing," the Nasser Saladin Brigades. According to Potter, Abu Mujahid spoke of the PRC's "attempts to play peacemaker between the warring Palestinian factions."

Said Abu Mujahid: "We cry blood when we see the problems between Hamas and Fatah. We have made every effort to find a solution, and so far we have failed. But we must continue to work toward unity. Our enemy is Israel."

Also on May 23, the National Post carried Matthew Fisher's report from Gaza City under the heading, "Gun battle may have Gaza on verge of civil war." Fisher described attempts by a Hamas spokesperson to deny there is any real factional fighting, let alone a threat of civil war. Instead, the spokesperson attributed the fighting to a conspiracy of "collaborators" working for Americans and Israelis who have orchestrated the violence – an extreme view held by very few Palestinians themselves.

CBC's Adrienne Arsenault summed up the state of affairs in her May 20 report about the power struggle: "But this is not Palestinian civil war. Not yet, perhaps."

While Canadian journalists described the violence in Gaza as an intra-Palestinian affair, some of the British media tried to place much of the responsibility on Israel.

For instance, Jeremy Bowen, the BBC's Middle East editor, reported from Gaza on May 23. He said that while there is competition for power between Hamas and Fatah, "financial sanctions that have been imposed by Israel and the Western powers" and "the pressure that never goes away, which comes from the Israeli occupation" were to blame for the turmoil.

Only at the tail end of his report did he acknowledge that Israel and the United States have committed money for humanitarian assistance to the Palestinian people. And he failed to note that Israel had unilaterally withdrawn from Gaza in August 2005, making his insistence on what he described as "40 years of a violent Israeli occupation" all the more a gratuitous slap at Israel.

* * *

In keeping with his predilection for poking holes in conventional wisdom, National Post columnist Robert Fulford wrote "Islam's yearning for empire," (May 20), which elicited quite a number of letters to the editor.

Drawing attention to a recent book by University of London professor Efraim Karsh, Islamic Imperialism: A History, Fulford agreed that western intellectuals must stop blaming "western imperialism" for the problems of the Middle East, including Islamist violence (which has spread abroad). Instead, they must see Arabs and Muslims not as perpetual victims but as actors responsible for their own deeds and failures.

As Fulford explained, Islamist violence is not a reaction to Western imperialism, but rather is indigenous to Muslim culture, "and the most significant product of the belief that politics and religion are one."

Karsh believes, Fulford wrote, that this imperialist tendency derives from a historic tradition that harks back centuries, and is informed by a longing to return to Islam's glory days when it spread as far west as Andalusian Spain – and, it might be added, northward to the gates of Vienna.

Stronach has no regrets over party switch

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — After two years in the House of Commons, Belinda Stronach says she has "learned how to ask a question that is actually an allegation and how to give an answer that is actually a smokescreen."

When asked about crossing the floor from the Tory benches to join the Liberal government a year ago, Stronach told a Women's Federation CJA event last week that she doesn't have regrets and that she's glad she acted on her principles.

"Many assume that I regret it, that I made the wrong choice. But they are wrong. Nothing in my professional life has given me more satisfaction than standing up for what I believe in," said Stronach, the MP for Newmarket-Aurora who left a $12-million-a-year position as CEO and president of Magna International to run in the June 2004 federal election after losing a bid to lead the new Conservative party to Stephen Harper. She is now Opposition transport critic.

Though she's content now, she said she didn't feel so certain about her choice at the time.

"There are times in your life when you are in so deep, you can't make rational decisions... I trusted my gut, my intuition. The quality of your character is put to the test. I look back with my pride in my decision."

MP opposes Tory childcare plan

Stronach said that she "does not share Harper's vision of what Canada is or what it should become" and that she never really cared for his ideas and wouldn't have been happy implementing them, if she was in his government today.

If she does regret anything about jumping from the private to public spheres, it's all the personal questions she gets. "I mean does anybody ask [Calgary Conservative MP] Jason Kenney what kind of shoes he wears?"

But she said she has learned to care less about what others think. "People are always going to talk... The only opinion you have to live with 24/7 is your own."

Stronach, 40, said she got used to people insinuating that she rapidly rose to the top of Magna, a major auto parts company founded by her father Frank Stronach, because of her family connections.

"People on the inside knew I earned my stripes. Those on the outside thought Daddy bought it for me like a pony. What could I do? Take out an ad in the newspaper?"

Stronach, who took only written questions, was vague about her future political ambitions. In April, she announced that she would not be seeking the Liberal leadership "at this time."

She differed with interim Liberal leader Bill Graham on extending Canada's military presence in Afghanistan for two more years. She said she did so because the government's two days' notice before last month's debate on the issue wasn't enough time, nor was the six hours allotted for debate in the House.

"Voting 'no' does not not mean I do not support the troops... I felt there was an abuse of process... The Conservatives were wrong to try to box us in for purely political reasons," said Stronach, who still has questions about the nature of the mission and the readiness of Canadian troops to carry it out.

Her speech at the Women's Federation CJA event focused on the need for Canada to stay competitive in a changing global economy, and particularly in the wake of the rising economic power of China and India, which have a combined population of more than two billion people.

Key to that is quality education, from early childhood to retraining older workers, as well as investment in research and development, she said.

"We, with just 32 million people, can't afford to waste the potential of one person... We have to foster a culture of lifelong learning to keep pace with the world," she said.

She criticized Harper's direct childcare subsidy to parents.

"It amounts to about $3 a day, which is OK if your child is in care for 20 minutes a day... The single mom earning minimum wage with a son will get the same amount as Celine Dion, if she moved back to Canada. That's not fair," she said.

Stronach said at least half of all MPs should be women, and the current 20 per cent is much too low. Getting women nominated by their party is the toughest part, but as candidates they have a "fair shot" at getting elected, she said.

Women are reluctant to enter the "rough sport"of politics, but they are engaged in the issues and think they can have an impact other ways, she said. Women bear the major responsibility for raising children, she said, and ways must be found to make it possible for them to contribute to public life.

ב-3 במאי, סמוך לים השואה, יצאנו קבוצה של אופנוענים יהודים לעיירה ויטהול בקנקי לראות את בית הספר הנוצרי שעשה מעשה חסר תקדים להנצחת השואה ולימוד סובלנות בין אנשים. הסרט הדוקומנטארי Paper Clips מספר את סיפורם של מורים ותלמידים שבמטגרת לימודי סובלנות אספו שישה מיליון מחדקי נייר בניסיון להבין ולחוש מה המספר הנורא הזה אומר. הם הקימו מוזיאון שואה קטן בבית ספרם בתוך קרון רכבת מקורי שהסיע יהודים ואחרים לאושוויץ. הקרון נתרם על ידי זוג עיתונאים גרמני. מי שלא ראה את הסרט-שווה מאוד לראותו בהיראו.

היורדים והחצבעה בבחירות

אלא שבזיון בבעייה זו, מציע "שלום טורונטו" לאזן את הקונפליקט הדמוגרפי על ידי מתן זכות הצבעה ליורדים. הניסוק:

"אחרי הכל, הישראלים החיים בטורונטו גם הם אנשי מילואים; גם הם משרתי ישראל, גם הם אנשי הצינות המדרגית... שימור זכותם להצביע יבטיח את שימור זכותנו על אדמת הקודש".

"גם הם משרתי ישראל"-איך בדיוק הם משרתים את ישראל? באיטון סנטר או בקוסקו? ישראלים בטורונטו משרתים רק את עצמם. רובם המכריע גם לא עושים שום פעולה התנדבותית. משפטים כמו זה רצוי שלא ייאמרו. קשה להתייחס ברצינות לדברים כאלה.

Leading engineer would rather be known as a mensch

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Manuel Linden, 79, a celebrated engineer and professor who has won awards and worked on the legendary Avro Arrow, and who grew up on the rough streets of Glasgow, would rather be remembered as a humanitarian and a mensch.

"What can I say, I'm just a mensch," Linden said with a grin. "Can I say that about myself? I'd like others to consider that I lived and died a mensch."

Linden, a gentle, soft-spoken, yet opinionated Scot – who often reminds people that he didn't have an accent until he moved to Canada in 1951 – attributes his work ethic, his altruistic spirit, his love for Judaism and his dedication to his family to his upbringing.

"I was brought up in 1926 with a family of, at one time, nine children, in a small, sparse flat in Glasgow with no hot water, no bathroom facility... We used a basin in the kitchen and we all took turns. There was little privacy, but complete respect for each other's property rights. We lived like Diogenes. We had no possessions. Our wants were very limited... We feared nothing, we possessed nothing, we had nothing... But we had a lot."

Perhaps it was because Linden and his family once teetered on the brink of poverty themselves that he has such respect for the less fortunate.

"I have great respect for street people, those who have fallen through the cracks," Linden said, adding that he once served as a judge for Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee's annual creative writing contest for the homeless.

Linden recalled that Jewish people in Glasgow in the 1930s and '40s were exposed to what he called "street anti-Semitism." He said that if he revealed he was Jewish to Protestant bullies on the streets of Glasgow, he'd be beaten up.

"I was brought up in a rough and tough neighbourhood. If you didn't hit them first, you were in trouble."

At the time, Linden said, people were disenchanted with the quality of life.

"Jewish people in that era struggled. They were battered and burned from life in Europe."

But, he added, they always maintained a sense of self-worth and dignity.

Linden immigrated to Toronto in 1951 when he was 23 years old, after he had been educated in Glasgow.

He said what brought him here were the job opportunities for educated men in the field of engineering.

"I was working the next day," he said.

He did engineering design work for Massey Ferguson, a producer of farming tractors, and was successful in improving a device used to spread manure.

"We had to originate a device that, if the blades went over a stone, it would disconnect the machine from the drive shafts. That was my first job, and my design worked out," he said.

Linden also discussed his work on the Avro Arrow, a white jet interceptor developed in Ontario in the 1950s that some say would have led Canada to the top of the aviation industry. Instead, then-prime minister John Diefenbaker abandoned the $400-million dollar project.

Manuel Linden

Still, Linden spoke with great pride about his part in designing an airplane that he said was 25 years ahead of its time.

"I designed a very evolutionary method of locking the undercarriage, the lock and release mechanism that was flexible, so that in flight, it moved with the wind," he said.

"I had to devise a method whereby in flight, the undercarriage would float like a cushion, but when it came in to land, it had to be solid," Linden said.

He said when the project was abandoned, it was the first time in his life he had seen so many grown men cry openly.

"They took the planes out of the air and destroyed them so that there would be no trace at all of Canada's contribution," Linden said, shaking his head disapprovingly.

Despite his accomplishments in the field of engineering, for which he has won numerous awards from organizations including the Ontario Association of Certified Engineering Technicians and Technologists and the Institute of Chartered Engineers of Canada, Linden has also been recognized as a writer, a poet, a professor, a musician and a humanitarian.

"I was very involved in music with a Scottish Jewish pipe band, the only Jewish pipe band in the world. I played drums as a solo drummer," he said, adding that he would go to hospitals and play for sick children.

Even during a period when he was hospitalized, Linden found a way to contribute by writing a poem that he hoped would touch people's hearts.

He said when he was recovering in the hospital three years ago, he wrote a poem called A New Day is Born and was stunned by the reaction it received.

"I read it to [the nurse]. I hardly believed this, but she took her nursing cap off, she threw it aside of the bed, she put her arms around me and hugged me and she was welling with tears. She said it was the most beautiful thing she had ever read."

The last stanza of Linden's poem reflects his positive attitude and the kind of wisdom that comes with life experience: "And today is the tomorrow, we worried about yesterday, /That somehow never came, and like the dawn, it was gone, /And I knew, that a new day was born!"

Despite his many interests, whether scholarly, musical or artistic, the one aspect of his life Linden seems to be most proud of is the family that shaped him into a respectful Jewish man and the family that he himself shaped.

"I think I was most fortunate to be brought up in a family with differentials. My late father was from the old European school, steeped in tradition, [but] still modernistic in his attitudes. I was fortunate that I had a grandfather, bless his memory, who was steeped in Jewish tradition and Jewish learning, the Torah."

He said the first thing his grandfather did when he came to Scotland was study and learn to speak English, which Linden said, was very unusual because most people went straight into work.

"He was shrouded in the philosophy of the greats of our heritage, the Ethics of Our Fathers and the great legacy, most of which has left us, and Jewish traditions and values," Linden said.

"I'm proud of my family and certain values that I've been able to inculcate."

He said he also takes pride in the fact that he's managed to raise a family, plant a tree and write a book, the three accomplishments outlined in the Talmud, what he sees as "the ethics of our fathers."

Although Linden was cautious about not wanting to sound boring or, worst of all, narcissistic, he didn't shy away from answering personal questions about himself, his life, his philosophy and his accomplishments.

"Above all, my religion is to do good. I would like to say that my country is the world. I'm conscious of the greatest good. I'm also conscious of the inadequacies and deliberations which cause suffering. I'm a humanitarian. I've received seven awards in this field. I'm not just looking for a piece of paper, but I'm altruistic, which is a higher degree of philanthropy. My philosophy is not only about giving, but about giving of yourself."

In much the same way a grandfather would offer advice to his grandchild, Linden had this to say about living a fulfilling life: "Walk humbly, do justly, love with mercy, do the right thing because it's the right thing to do, but don't be so self-opinionated or self-absorbed that you can't follow the dictates of your heart."

Hard to choose from the dairy possibilities for Shavuot

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Heavy cheesecakes topped with fresh, ripe fruits; butter cookies that dissolve at the slightest touch of the tongue; blintzes filled with sweetened cottage cheese and served with blueberry sauce or dollops of thick sour cream – these are the foods of Shavuot.

Shavuot is the holiday for which I have the most difficult time coming up with a menu. Why? All year long when I come across an interesting and special dairy recipe, I put it away with the thought of Shavuot in mind. Then, the week before, I pull out all these recipes and agonize about which ones to make. I save so many wonderful dairy recipes for this holiday that it's hard to decide which ones to make.

Probably the most popular foods for Shavuot are blintzes and cheesecakes, but almost any dish that contains dairy is customary. Many people like to serve all white foods to symbolize the purity of the Torah that was given to us on this day.

COLD STRAWBERRY SOUP

Cool and refreshing, this is one of my favourites. I serve it often for summer Shabbat lunches.

1 cup sugar
½ cup cornstarch
1½ cups grape juice or wine
1 cup water
1 tbsp. vanilla
2 1-pt. containers of strawberries
¼ cup lemon juice
½ cup orange juice concentrate
1½ cups additional juice (grape, orange or apple)
2 cups sour cream, optional

Mix sugar and cornstarch, then add grape juice and water. Bring to a boil, stirring constantly, until thickened. Remove from heat and add vanilla. Save about ½ container of the prettiest strawberries for garnish and mash the remainder. Add lemon juice and orange juice concentrate. Add to soup mixture. Add remaining juice until mixture is of desired consistency. Add the sour cream to the soup at this point if using. Chill and serve topped with strawberry slices.

BAKED BLINTZES IN CUSTARD

4 eggs
1½ cups sour cream
1 tbsp. orange juice
1 tsp. vanilla
¼ cup sugar
¼ tsp. salt
1 tbsp. grated orange rind
12 frozen blintzes, any kind
2 tbsp. butter

Blend all ingredients except blintzes and butter together to make a sauce. Melt 2 tbsp. butter in a flat casserole that will hold the blintzes in a single layer. Place the frozen blintzes in the casserole (any flavours or combinations of flavours – fruit and/or cheese). Pour sauce over blintzes and bake uncovered at 350 for 45 minutes.

BANANA NUT CHEESECAKE

1 cup chocolate wafer crumbs
¼ cup margarine or butter, melted
16 oz. cream cheese softened
½ cup sugar
½ cup mashed ripe bananas
2 large eggs
¼ cup chopped walnuts or pecans
⅓ cup milk chocolate chips
1 tbsp. margarine or butter
2 tbsp. water

Combine crumbs and margarine; press onto the bottom of a 9-in. springform pan and bake at 350 for 10 minutes.

Combine cream cheese, sugar and bananas, mixing at medium speed on electric mixer until well blended. Add eggs, one at a time, mixing well after each addition. Stir in nuts. Pour over crust. Bake at 350 for 40 minutes. Loosen cake from rim and cool before removing rim of pan.

Melt chocolate pieces and margarine or butter with water over low heat, stirring until smooth. Drizzle over cheesecake. Chill.

PRALINE CHEESECAKE

1 cup graham cracker crumbs
3 tbsp. sugar
3 tbsp. margarine, melted
24 oz. cream cheese, softened
¼ cup dark brown sugar, packed
2 tbsp. all-purpose flour
3 large eggs
2 tsp. vanilla
½ cup pecans, finely chopped
maple syrup and pecan halves for garnish

Combine graham cracker crumbs, granulated sugar and margarine; press onto bottom of 9-in. springform pan. Bake at 350 for 10 minutes.

Combine cream cheese, brown sugar and flour, mixing at medium speed of electric mixer until well blended. Add eggs, one at a time, mixing well after each addition. Blend in vanilla; stir in chopped pecans. Pour over crust. Bake at 450 for 10 minutes. Reduce oven temperature to 250 and continue baking an additional 30 minutes. Loosen cake from rim of pan and cool before removing rim. Chill. Brush with maple syrup and top with pecan halves.

CUPE votes to boycott Israel

CJN Staff and Jerusalem Post

The Ontario division of Canada's largest union voted Saturday to support an international campaign that is boycotting Israel over its treatment of Palestinians.

Delegates to the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) Ontario convention in Ottawa voted overwhelmingly to support the campaign until Israel recognizes "the Palestinians' right to self-determination." The Ontario union represents more than 200,000 workers.

Sid Ryan, president of CUPE Ontario, said, "This is not an attack on Jewish people. It's [an objection to] the State of Israel's policies on Palestinians. They say they are creating an independent state, but they're not giving them the tools to do that," the National Post reported.

The CUPE resolution was adopted unanimously by 896 delegates. According to a CUPE news release, the labour organization also condemned Israel's separation barrier as an "apartheid wall."

Canadian Jewish Congress questioned whether the resolution represented the views of the majority of CUPE members.

"This is the kind of one-sided statement that comes out from a very small group of activists, that is foisted on an otherwise respected labour union," said Steven Shulman, Ontario regional director and legal counsel for Congress. "Some sort of vote took place on a statement that we don't believe represents the majority of the rank and file. It should be seen as an embarrassment for CUPE."

Shulman said Congress had received many e-mails from CUPE members who said "they didn't know anything about it and are embarrassed by it."

He said the resolution, as described in a CUPE press release, "is based on falsehoods and is one-sided and is emphatically a propaganda statement."

Under the resolution approved by delegates, CUPE Ontario will develop an education campaign about the issue, including Canada's political and economic support for Israeli policies, similar to the campaign developed by CUPE British Columbia.

"Boycott, divestment and sanction worked to end apartheid in South Africa," said Katherine Nastovski, chair of the CUPE Ontario international solidarity committee. "We believe the same strategy will work to enforce the rights of Palestinian people, including the right of refugees to return to their homes and properties."

CUPE noted that Canada has a free trade agreement with Israel and that Ontario's liquor control board carries more than 30 Israeli wines.

CUPE's move is part of an international campaign of boycott, divestment and sanctions against Israel. The global campaign started last July and has been supported by many North American churches, 20 Quebec organizations and others.

In Britain, meanwhile, members of the country's largest union of college teachers agreed Monday to boycott Israel over what members called "apartheid" policies for Palestinians, saying union members will refuse to co-operate with Israeli academics who do not "disassociate themselves from such policies."

The 69,000-member National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education (NATFHE) debated the proposal for the boycott at its annual conference in the northern English city of Blackpool. Two parts of the motion passed with a show of hands while a third went to a vote. Under the boycott, union members also will not submit articles to Israeli research papers.

Opposition to the vote culminated on Saturday with a letter to The Guardian newspaper in which hundreds of academics called on NATFHE to reject the motion.

Last week, the American Association for the Advancement of Science (AAAS) also announced that it condemned the proposed boycott, and urged NATFHE to withdraw the motion.

The statement released by the AAAS board of directors said it joined with other organizations "in condemning this proposed boycott as antithetical to the positive role of free scientific inquiry in improving the lives of all citizens of the world, and in promoting co-operation among nations, despite political differences."

It added: "Free scientific inquiry and associated international collaborations should not be compromised in order to advance a political agenda unrelated to scientific and scholarly matters."

Bar-Ilan University's International Advisory Board on Academic Freedom also called for an immediate withdrawal of the boycott motion. It published an online petition calling on NATFHE members, the academic community and the general public to oppose the boycott, explaining why an academic boycott was wrong. The petition was signed by thousands of international academics.

In another letter that was also published Saturday in The Guardian, however, a group of Palestinian academics applauded the boycott motion.

Last year, another British faculty group, the British Association of University Teachers (AUT), voted to boycott Haifa and Bar-Ilan universities, charging them with complicity in Israel's "suppression of the Palestinians." The council of the association reversed the decision after hearing objections from leading scholars and academic organizations.

NATFHE and the AUT are due to merge next month and any decisions made by the unions prior to the merger – including a possible NATFHE vote in favour of boycotting Israeli academics – will be automatically nullified by the merger.

Eto, three times named the African Footballer of the Year and this season's top scorer in the Spanish Premier Soccer League, came to Israel to encourage Israeli and Palestinian youngsters to come together on the soccer field in search of peace. Here he is seen at the centre of a cluster of his young Israeli and Palestinian fans. [Israel photo]

Iran claims nuclear fusion research

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Iran has conducted research into nuclear fusion, an Iranian nuclear official was reported as saying Monday by state television.

It was the first time the country declared such a development.

"Iranian nuclear scientists are competing with the advanced world in the field of producing nuclear energy through fusion," the official, Sadat Hosseini, was reported as saying by the television network.

It was not immediately clear why Iran had decided to announce the research only now, but the move seemed to be part of the country's defiance of world calls for it to limit its nuclear program to activities that could not be used for making weapons. Nuclear fusion is employed by certain kinds of atomic bombs.

The five major powers on the UN Security Council – the United States, Russia, China, Britain and France – and Germany were scheduled to meet in London on Wednesday to discuss a plan intended to persuade Iran to stop enriching uranium – a process that produces fuel for nuclear generators of electricity or material for bombs.

Foreign ministers of the six countries appeared to have narrowed their differences on a package of rewards or sanctions that are to be put before Iran.

The United States and some of its allies accuse Iran of using a civilian nuclear program as a cover to produce nuclear weapons. Iran denies this, saying its nuclear program is merely to generate electricity.

The Security Council gave Iran until the end of April to suspend all activities linked to enrichment. But Iran ignored the demand and announced last month that it had for the first time successfully enriched uranium and was performing research on advanced centrifuges to enable it to accelerate its enrichment.

In related news, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Sunday that the "international Zionist web" was trying to keep him from visiting Germany for the World Cup soccer match.

The Iranian president, who previously stated his intention to travel to Germany for the World Cup games that will take place there this summer, said that he had not yet decided on the matter. Iran is one of the 32 nations participating in the World Cup. "My decision depends on a lot of different things," Ahmadinejad said.

Some German officials have been pressing to prevent Ahmadinejad's visit following numerous statements that he made casting doubt about the occurrence of the Holocaust, which he reiterated in an interview to Der Spiegel, saying that he doubted whether the Germans had been allowed to write "the truth" about the Holocaust.

"I only accept something as the truth if I am truly convinced of it," Ahamdinejad asserted.

U.S. Congress considers vote on Jewish refugees

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The U.S. Congress will consider a resolution that calls on the president to instruct government officials to match any reference to Palestinian refugees in international fora with a reference to Jewish and Christian refugees from Arab lands.

The resolution also urges the president to "make clear that the government of the United States supports the position that, as an integral part of any comprehensive peace, the issue of refugees and mass violations of human rights of minorities in Arab and Muslim countries… must be resolved in a manner that includes recognition of the legitimate rights of all refugees displaced from Arab countries."

The bipartisan resolution has been introduced in the Senate and is expected to come before the House of Representatives this week. It is being advanced by prominent U.S. lawmakers and stands a good chance of passing before the November congressional elections, said Stanley Urman, executive director of Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC), a coalition of American Jewish organizations.

The resolution, which JJAC is supporting, is "the strongest declaration on Jewish refugees" by the United States, he said.

While it is only a "sense of the Congress" statement and cannot compel the executive branch to comply, it has tremendous educational and symbolic value, Urman said.

Both houses of Congress will hold hearings to discuss the resolution, providing the venue for advocates on behalf of Jewish refugees to present the human rights case for Jews who were expelled from Arab countries beginning in the 1940s.

An estimated 850,000 to 900,000 Jews were forced to leave their homes in Algeria, Egypt, Lebanon, Libya, Morocco, Syria, Tunisia, Iran, Iraq and Yemen.

According to the American Sephardi Association, a partner of JJAC, discrimination against Jews increased after the creation of the State of Israel in 1948, and Jews "endured humiliation, discrimination, human rights abuses, organized persecution and expulsion."

Urman said discussion of the Mideast refugee issue has focused exclusively on Palestinians, ignoring the Jewish dimension to the problem. JJAC has been trying to put the Jewish refugee issue on the agenda of the "Quartet" of parties that sponsored the "Road Map" Mideast peace plan – the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations.

The congressional resolution is being spearheaded by Senator Rick Santorum, the third-ranking Republican in the Senate, Senator Norm Coleman, Senator Dick Durbin and Senator Frank Lautenberg. Supporters in the House include Tom Lantos and Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, co-chairs of Congress' Mideast subcommittee of the international affairs committee, and congressmen Jerrold Nadler and Michael Ferguson.

"Compensation for refugees displaced by wars in the Middle East and their aftermath has long been a cornerstone of Middle East peace making," said Lantos. "This principle must apply to all refugees, Jewish as well as Palestinian."

Israel Briefs

Sharon to be moved

Hadassah-University Medical Center in Jerusalem said former prime minister Ariel Sharon will soon be transferred to Sheba Medical Center at the Tel Hashomer hospital in Tel Aviv. He will receive treatment in an 18-bed respiratory care and rehabilitation department described by officials as "a hospital within a hospital."

Weapons transfer to Abbas

Israel last week agreed to transfer a small amount of weapons to help guard Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. The decision by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defence Minister Amir Peretz came amid growing threats on Abbas' life. The weapons are expected to be sent to Abbas' presidential guard via a third party, likely Egypt or Jordan.

Red Cross to vote on MDA

The Red Cross is expected to vote to admit Israel's emergency services agency next month. Magen David Adom has been excluded from full member status in the international humanitarian organization. In December, a conflict over Magen David's Jewish star emblem was put to rest, but the Israeli agency still faces opposition from Arab and Islamic states and must complete certain regulatory steps prior to entry. The June resolution will also grant full member status to the Palestinian emergency services outfit.

U.K. seeks compensation

Britain asked Israel to compensate the families of two British activists killed in Gaza. British Attorney General Peter Goldsmith, in Israel last week for a Bar Association event, also held meetings with the Foreign Ministry and Justice Ministry about the 2003 deaths of Tom Hurndall and James Miller. Both were shot by Israeli forces in the southern town of Rafah. Israel has jailed the soldier who killed Hurndall but dropped charges against an officer blamed in the Miller case. Israel's Foreign Ministry said both cases have been handled by the legal establishment. There was no immediate comment from the Justice Ministry.

Israelis to sue Iranian prez

Israeli officials are preparing to sue Iran's president at the International Court of Justice. The lawsuit would accuse Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of conspiring to commit crimes against humanity because of his repeated threats to destroy Israel. Among those developing the lawsuit are Meir Rosenne, Israel's former ambassador to the United States and France, and former cabinet minister Dan Naveh.

Yad Vashem a key symbol

Yad Vashem is the most prominent symbol of modern-day Jerusalem for Israeli Jews, a new poll says. The poll found 37 per cent of Israeli Jews view Yad Vashem as the site that symbolizes today's Jerusalem, compared to 20 per cent who said the outdoor Mahane Yehuda market, 12 per cent who cited the Israel Museum and 9 per cent who named Mount Herzl and the gravesite of the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, according to a Gesher poll carried out ahead of Jerusalem Day.

First female IAF pilot dies

Yael Rom, the Israeli Air Force's first female pilot, died May 24 in Haifa at 74. Rom earned her wings in 1951 and went on to fly DC-3 transport planes. She was one of two women commissioned as officers and the first of five to fly in the early IAF. As a 29-year-old reservist, she piloted the lead plane in a 16-aircraft formation that dropped a crack paratrooper unit on the Mitla Pass at the start of the 1956 Sinai Campaign.

Church wants goods labeled

Israeli media reported that the Church of Scotland has called on European authorities to identify products made in Israel's West Bank settlements. The call came from the church's General Assembly, which met in Edinburgh last week. A committee reported the church doesn't hold any investments directly relating to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Toronto artist reborn after stroke

Harold Bonaparte is a gifted artist who had two strokes within days of each other.

It was the summer of 2002 and he was in his early 70s.

A graphic designer before retirement, his hobbies included calligraphy and photography. He loved fine handwriting and photographing panoramic landscapes and historic buildings.

After the strokes, the right side of his body was paralyzed. His right hand – his drawing hand – no longer functioned. His left eye was half closed and he had reduced vision in his right eye. His memory and his speech were mildly impaired.

Physiotherapists and occupational therapists at Markham-Stouffville Hospital and later at Baycrest's Day Treatment Centre helped Bonaparte rebuild some of his muscle strength and limb movement. Speech and cognitive therapists helped him, too.

But the artist inside him could not find outward expression and he became depressed. His spirit was broken and he was "giving up," says his wife, Rose.

"He felt he couldn't express himself like he used to. He couldn't do art anymore and that was it."

Enter Debbie Van der Laan. For the past 16 years, she has worked with stroke survivors as a dance therapist at Baycrest's Wagman Centre.

"I'm in the field of helping people reconnect to themselves," she says. "I use an expressive arts therapy approach with my group. It's not so much about learning a particular dance, but more about the elements of how you use rhythm, time and space."

Van der Laan met Bonaparte during his rehab at Baycrest's Day Treatment Centre. She had a hunch that her dance therapy program was just what Bonaparte needed to reawaken his inner artist. But he was reluctant to join Van der Laan's Stroke Recovery Group at the Wagman Centre. After all, he had not been much of a dancer throughout his life.

"It's always a stubborn 'no' at first with Harold," says Rose. But after a bit of prodding, he agreed to give dance therapy a try with his wife as his partner.

"The Wagman program was the best thing that ever happened to us," says Rose.

Bonaparte began to enjoy the classes and have fun with movement. It did wonders for his confidence and mood, and also improved his gait and posture. Most importantly, he began to feel alive again.

"There is definitely more joy in his voice and a lightness to him," says Van der Laan.

But dance was just the beginning. Bonaparte was ready to reacquaint himself with art again. He signed up for a ceramics class at Wagman. He would try working with his left hand, which had not been injured by the strokes.

The art instructor gave him sponges to soak in coloured paint and daub on the ceramics. Bonaparte became frustrated quickly because it reminded him of how far he'd fallen artistically. "I was at the pinnacle of my talent in calligraphy and now I'm doing sponge work," he recalls.

Sensing his dejection, the instructor suggested that he try a painting-on-canvas class. Little did the instructor know that such encouragement would unleash the artist genie out of the bottle.

It had been more than 50 years since Bonaparte had painted on canvas. In the early 1950s as a young newlywed, he had dabbled in painting, recreating copies of famous works. They were impressive pieces, but he soon lost interest and moved into graphic design. Now life was about to come full circle.

Since he joined the art classes at the Wagman, Bonaparte has painted portraits, still-lifes and landscapes – works that he has produced with one relatively good eye and the "wrong" hand.

"It's astronomical," says Rose. "I never believed he could come this far in just a few years."

Bonaparte's transformation is remarkable, Van der Laan says. "It is the result of different circles of support. His wife and family are his inner circle. Baycrest and Wagman staff and other stroke survivors he has met in his classes are his outer circle.

"Harold has learned that he is not defined by his stroke or his wheelchair," she says.

He is a husband, a father, and a mentor to newcomers in the stroke rehabilitation program – and an artist reborn.

Hidden Treasure

"Oh, hello Molly. Come right in. Here, let me have your raincoat. Wow, the rain's really coming down. You must be soaked. Hold on, I'll get Shira."

Mrs. Levine turned around. "Shira!" she called. "Your friend Molly's here!"

Shira came running down the stairs. "Hey Molly, what's going on?"

"I came to look for buried treasure with you. You said we could dig together in the backyard, remember?"

"Uh yes, but today? It's pouring outside, and it's going to be so muddy out there."

"Oh. Right." Molly thought for a moment. "Well, let's look for treasure inside the house instead."

"OK. Fine. Where do you want to look?"

"I don't know. Somewhere dark and secret."

"I don't think we have anything like that here. Well, maybe we can try the basement."

"Oh, that's perfect!" exclaimed Molly.

But the minute Shira opened the basement door, Molly knew there was no hidden treasure to be found here. The basement was completely finished, carpeted and painted. But she didn't want to make Shira feel bad, so she pretended to look anyway.

"Hmmm... I'll bet there's something hidden under this potted plant," she declared, as Shira checked behind her mother's computer. "No, not here. Uh, maybe in this office chair. Nope, nothing in here."

Ten minutes later, Shira finally said, "I don't think we'll find anything down here."

"Yeah, I guess you're right," agreed Molly, as they ascended the stairs. "I told you, we need someplace dark and secret."

"How about a closet?"

"Maybe," said Molly, growing more and more doubtful that there was anything secret to be found in this house. Shira opened the closet door.

"Oooo, it's dark in here. Molly, turn on the light."

"Shira, if the light was on, it wouldn't be dark and secret, would it?" explained Molly, closing the door.

"Now it's pitch dark!"

"Don't worry, I have a flashlight. Uh oh, I left it in my raincoat. Do you know where it is?"

"It's probably hanging in this closet somewhere."

"Oh. No, don't open the door, I can find it in the dark. Here! I found my coat, let me get out the flashlight. Ah, much better."

Together, they scrounged the floorboards for traces of treasure.

"Hmmm...I don't see anything down here. Maybe there's something hidden in the walls." Molly flashed the beam of light around the walls, steadily checking higher and higher. "Hey look, there's something attached to the ceiling. It looks like a handle. Here, pick me up."

Shira gave Molly a boost, and Molly grabbed hold of a shelf to stay balanced.

"Careful," cautioned Shira.

Molly pulled the handle. Nothing happened. She tried turning it. First this way, then that way. It squeaked rustily, and turned. Molly gave it a yank, and a ceiling tile folded down, revealing a slide-down ladder. She pulled it down, and beamed at Shira, who was watching, awed.

"Now what?" inquired Shira timidly.

"We go up."

Molly excitedly climbed the ladder, and stepped into the attic. "OK Shira, your turn!"

Shira gripped the siderails and gingerly started to climb, one careful step after another. Finally she stuck her head into the attic, immediately sneezing. "There's so much dust up here."

"That's the whole point," explained Molly." That means we might actually find treasure here."

"Oh." Shira looked like she wanted to climb down.

"C'mon up!" demanded Molly, taking Shira's hands and lifting her in.

The attic was eerily quiet, except for the pitter-patter of the rain. Dim light penetrated a single, small window. Faded, dusty boxes leaned on each other. Molly rushed over to them. "Let's see what we can find here!"

"Molly, I'm scared. Let's go down."

"Are you crazy? This is what we've been looking for the whole day!"

"Oh."

"If only we had more light up here, so I could see things better. My flashlight is burning out. Oh forget it." Molly switched off the fading flashlight.

"Now it's really dark! Molly, let's..."

A blazing flash of lightning split the sky.

"Aaa! Molly! Where's the ladder?"

"Careful, you might fall through the floor opening. But why do you want the ladder? We've just started!"

A deafening crash of thunder burst through the attic.

"Molly! Let's - get - out - of - here — Aak! I just felt something on my head!"

"It's probably the rain. The roof is leaking a little...."

"SPIDERS! THERE ARE SPIDERS UP HERE! AAAAAAH!"

"Calm down. Hey, what's that?"

"WHAT'S WHAT?" demanded Shira, almost in hysterics.

"That thing over there," said Molly. "It looks like a little chest... It is! Uhh, I can't get it open. Wow! Let's bring it downstairs so we can see it in the light. There, the ladder's right there."

Shira dashed down the ladder, followed by Molly.

"Okay, now you can turn on the light." Shira did, shaking.

"Wow, it's sure bright in here," continued Molly, "All right, let's open this up."

"There you are," exclaimed Mrs. Levine, opening the closet door. "Shira! Molly! How did you get so dirty?" Her gaze fell on the ladder, still extended. "Were you up in the attic?"

"Yes, and we found a treasure chest!" proclaimed Molly, proudly displaying her find.

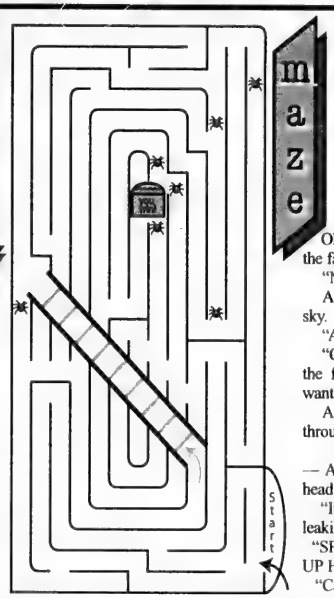
"Hmmm..." said Mrs. Levine. "This house was built by my great-grandfather, but I never heard of any treasure hidden away in the attic. Well, let's see what's inside."

"It isn't locked," declared Molly. "It's just jammed." She twisted the strap harder, harder, until it popped open. Slowly, reverently, Molly opened the treasure chest.

"Aw, it's not treasure." she realized.

"It's just pictures!" exclaimed Shira.

"Just pictures?" breathed Mrs. Levine, examining the pictures." Shira, this — this is your great-great-grandfather with his brothers, in Poland. And this baby is your great-grandfather. And here he is with your great-grandmother on their wedding day... Molly! Shira! What a treasure!"



Can you find the treasure? You'll have to climb that ladder, but don't pass through any spiders...

One thing leads to another

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

We have all known what it is like when we think a situation is small and unimportant, but it turns out to be something really major.

That's what happens to Vivian in Sarah Hartt-Snowbell's new book, Vivian Untangled (Napoleon Publishing, 2006).

Vivian is an 11-year-old girl who has what she considers a hard time of it. She doesn't do particularly well at school, she never seems to have enough money to get the stuff she wants, she doesn't have best friends, and her parents keep having terrible fights.

But her troubles really start when she sees a wonderful diary in a gift shop. She desperately wants it, but she has no money to buy it.

When she visits her grandfather, she finds a gold pen in the middle of a whole pile of things he keeps around the apartment. Thinking he won't notice, she takes the pen and sells it to a friend, who wants it as a present for her own grandfather.

It turns out, however, that the pen was the last gift Vivian's grandmother had given her husband before she died, and it is therefore very very precious to him. When Vivian tries to get it back, her friend is furious and refuses.

As if that isn't bad enough, Vivian overhears her father threaten to leave and sees that he has written the words, "Very attractive" and "Very tempting" beside a woman's phone number. Deciding that the woman is the one who has lured her father away, she calls her up and warns her to leave her father alone.

As you might expect, everything blows up in Vivian's face, and she has to deal with an embarrassed father (who had written those words beside a job counsellor's name and phone number), a furious and hurt grandfather, a bewildered mother, angry teachers and a best friend who turns out to be not-such-a-best-friend after all.

It is clear that telling a string of lies can easily turn out to be the worst way to handle a crisis, not the best.

Hartt-Snowbell is a Toronto author of children's books. You may remember that The CJN wrote about her wonderful book for young children A Little Something.

The Grade 3 students were part of a contingent from Associated Hebrew School's Posluns branch who collected the tabs for Jewish Women International to fund the purchase of a wheelchair. Students have collected 70 pounds of tabs for the school-wide student council project and are hoping to reach a goal of 500 pounds.

Awards highlight regional character of Canadian-Jewish literature

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Having written and published three novels in as many years, former Montrealer Edeet Ravel, now of Guelph, walked away with the fiction prize for her novel A Wall of Light (Random House Canada) at the Canadian Jewish Book Awards on May 23.

The prize-winning book completes the author's Tel Aviv trilogy, which also includes the previous titles Ten Thousand Lovers and Look for Me.

"It amazes me, too, that I managed to write three books in three years," Ravel said. "But it was a topic that was so close to me, that I have such a strong need to write about, that the books almost wrote themselves."

The trilogy paints a vivid picture of contemporary Israeli life from the 1970s to the present. It has attracted much praise but also some scorn for the manner in which it highlights dark and deeply troubling aspects of Israeli society.

An audience of about 200 people applauded as Ravel received a cheque for $1,000. "This prize has given me some much-needed reassurance," she told the gathering.

The 18th annual awards ceremony also included nine other prize winners and a tribute to recently deceased poet Irving Layton given by his son Max. A Toronto-area teacher and bookstore owner, Layton Jr. read and discussed The Swimmer, a key poem that made his father realize that he was and would always be a poet.

Another Canadian Jewish literary giant was recalled as Michael Posner received a book award for biography-memoir for The Last Honest Man: Mordecai Richler, an Oral Biography (McClelland & Stewart). Noting that Richler had often been overlooked for literary prizes, Posner said he hoped the award would serve to lead more readers to Richler's books.

This year's awards highlighted the strongly regional character of Canadian-Jewish literary output, displacing Toronto's usual dominance. By coincidence, several winners had strong connections with the city of Calgary; Montreal and Vancouver also featured prominently.

Eliezer Segal, who won the prize in biblical-rabbinic scholarship for From Sermon to Commentary: Expounding the Bible in Talmudic Babylonia (Wilfrid Laurier Press), is a professor of religious studies at the University of Calgary.

"This is an award that is very meaningful to me," he said. "The book is not easy reading, I admit. It deals with texts that were composed hundreds of years ago and not quite according to the norms of literature that we're used to."

Renee Norman, a Calgary native now living in Vancouver, won the poetry prize for her collection True Confessions (Inanna Publications). Her acceptance speech included a short poem describing her feelings. When an awards committee member phoned her with the news of her win, her tears flowed "like melted wax down a menorah."

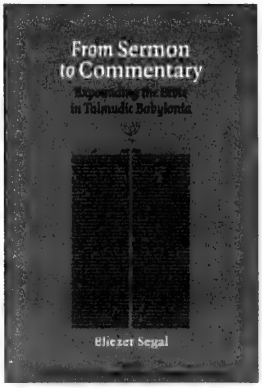
Her publisher, Luciano Ricciutelli of Toronto-based Inanna, seemed equally thrilled and described the prize as "an affirmation of what we're doing and the work we want to highlight and the authors we want to publish."

The award for scholarship on a Jewish subject went to Richard Menkis of Vancouver and Norman Ravvin, a native Calgarian living in Montreal, who co-edited The Canadian Jewish Studies Reader, which was published by the Calgary-based Red Deer Press.

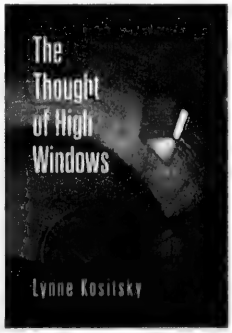
Another Calgary publisher, the University of Calgary Press, produced Memories, Dreams and Nightmares by Jack Weiss of Winnipeg, which took the Holocaust memoir prize.

The prize in Holocaust history went to Sara Ginaite-Rubinson, a professor at Toronto's York University, for Resistance and Survival (Mosaic Press). The book offers a thorough history of the Holocaust in Lithuania combined with the author's experiences as a partisan in the Kovno underground.

The prize in history went to Isabel Vincent, a Toronto author currently living in Rio de Janeiro, for Bodies and Souls (Random House Canada). The book describes the plight of Jewish women forced into prostitution in the Americas between 1860 and World War II.

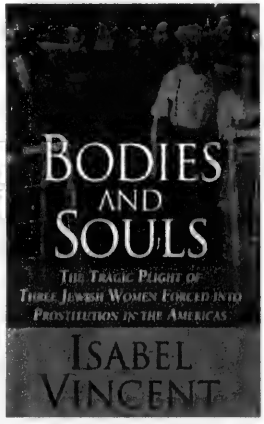


The prize in children's-youth literature went to Lynne Kositsky of Toronto for The Thought of High Windows (Kids Can Press). The book is based on a true story about some Belgian children who hid in a French chateau during World War II until the Vichy regime arrested them on Hitler's behalf.



The prize in Yiddish literature and translation went to Mervin Butovsky and Ode Garfinkle of Montreal, editors and translators of The Journals of Yaacov Zipper, 1950-1982 (McGill-Queen's University Press).

Zipper, former principal of Montreal's Peretz school, left behind a series of journals that were regarded as too important historically not to translate. "It took seven years of hard labour to see the fruition" of this project, said Garfinkle, his daughter.



The winning books were chosen from a pool of about 70 titles submitted to the awards committee, said Bernard Katz, chair of the committee and host of the awards ceremony. The state of Canadian Jewish publishing is therefore "very healthy," he said.

"We had far fewer books this year that were self-published – we do accept self-published books," he said. "I don't know if that's a blip or a trend, but it indicates to me, given the large number of submissions, that more publishers are publishing Jewish books here than ever before."

Six authors participated in an evening of readings at the Nadal JCC the day after receiving their awards.

The Toronto Jewish Folk Choir celebrates its 80th anniversary this year.

'When I sing, I think of my Bobba and Zaida'

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Rich Jewish melodies of the past and present will blend on stage June 4 as the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir celebrates its 80th anniversary with a special edition of its annual spring concert.

Canada's oldest Jewish choral group will sing a medley of classics from its eight decades, created by conductor Alexander Veprinsky, and it will also premiere a new, commissioned work by Winnipeg composer Sid Robinovitch.

"The medley for this special event consists of about 20 songs," Veprinsky said. "These songs reflect the history and variety of music the choir has been doing for the last 80 years."

Veprinsky said the medley showcases songs in such diverse languages as Yiddish, Hebrew, English, French, Russian and Ladino.

Robinovitch's piece, In Amerike, is a five-movement performance based on a Yiddish novel in verse by Montreal poet Sholem Shtern.

It details the immigrant story of Jews in the New World and honours past and present members of the choir, all of whom have been immigrants or children and grandchildren of Jewish immigrants who have maintained their strong connections to Yiddish culture.

"Our mandate is to preserve Yiddish culture and to enhance it," said choir member Enid Moscovitch. "[The choir embodies] the dedication and sense of community that we all have."

That community connection is one of the most profound feelings choir members experience themselves.

"When I sing, I think of my Bobba and Zaida," says choir member Linda Litwack.

"We sing with heart · I think you can really hear that."

Joining the singers on stage will be Lina Zemelman, who is marking her 30th anniversary as the choir's pianist, and Klezmer quintet Beyond the Pale.

Medley selections and the In Amerike story will also be narrated.

Founded in 1925, the choir hasn't missed an annual spring concert since the beginning.

In addition to the symbolism of the choir's 80th year on stage, the concert is also a tribute to Jean Shek, a 60-year member, and Brina Harris, who sang from the 1930s to the late 1990s. They both passed away recently.

"My mother was in the choir for 60 years," enthuses Ben Shek, himself a member since 1968. "This choir has lasted for so long because of the willpower and dedication of its members."

Veprinsky says the concert's immigrant experience theme will strike a chord with the audience.

"The audience will take away something that is very dear: the memories of immigration," he said. "And they will listen to beautiful music that offers a wide variety of Jewish songs and is pretty melodic."

CDs of last year's concert will be for sale at the show, which takes place at Leah Posluns Theatre, at 4588 Bathurst St.

LACHAN JEWISH CHAMBER CHOIR PREPARES FOR TORONTO CONCERT BEFORE CHINA TRIP

The Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir presents Jewish Identity Through The Musical Lens, a gala concert of Jewish choral music that moves chronologically from ancient chants to modern Israeli compositions.

The goal "is not only to entertain our audiences, but to educate them," said artistic director Benjamin Z. Maissner, who co-founded the choir in 1993. Maissner is cantor and musical director at Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple.

Not long after their Toronto performance, Lachan members depart for the 4th annual World Choir Games in Xiamen, China, where they intend to compete in two categories. More than 400 choirs and 20,000 singers from around the world are expected at the event, many with the shared purpose of bridging cultural differences through music, much as Olympic athletes attempt to do through sport.

The choir's repertoire is diverse and eclectic, and is meant to highlight the rich history of Jewish music, both secular and sacred. The music ranges in style from classical to popular and ranges in period from pre-Renaissance to 21st century. One of the choir's goals "is to broaden awareness of Jewish music and the many Jewish composers," Maissner said. ("Lachan" means "melody" in Hebrew.)

The Lachan Choir performs at Leah Posluns Theatre on June 12, at 8 p.m. 416-782-3214, www.lachan.org

Bronfman Foundation Endows Awards: The Samuel and Saidye Bronfman Family Foundation has endowed two new annual awards by which the Canada Council for the Arts will pay tribute to its former director, John Hobday. The Foundation donated $1 million to ensure that, beginning in 2007, two $10,000 awards will be presented each year to assist arts managers with their professional development.

"We are very pleased to honour John Hobday's long-term service with our foundation and his tireless commitment to the quality and professionalism of Canadian arts managers," said foundation president Stephen Bronfman. A reception celebrating the creation of the awards takes place at the Saidye Bronfman Centre in Montreal, on June 20.

CD teaches kids to express feelings

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Vancouver musician Marla Rosèn wants kids to talk about their emotions.

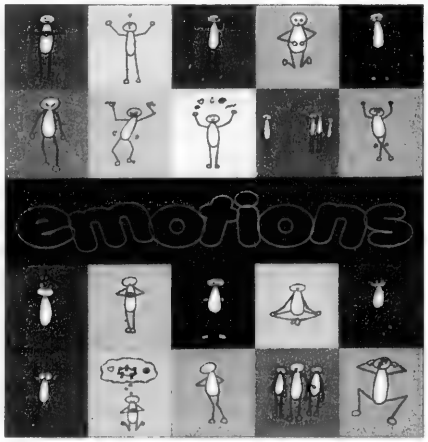
She produced her new CD, aptly called Emotions, in order to teach kids, ages two to seven, to express how they feel.

A Thornhill, Ont., native who graduated from York University with a major in theatre, Rosen is a teacher at a Montessori preschool.

She has toured Ontario with an interactive puppet show and concert, and led Imagination Workshop, a musical theatre and drama company for children.

"My CD grew from all of this. I wanted to give kids a fun way to talk about how they feel," says Rosen, who moved to Vancouver "for the weather and for a change of pace."

Montessori schools, are "reality based," she says. "There is a lack of music, which is important for self-expression. Kids need a comfortable place to talk about themselves."



In many learning environments, she says, the importance of self-expression through the arts is not valued as much as math or science.

"The denial of these aspects of the personality or the lack of recognition for their importance within an educational setting can often lead to reduced senses of confidence and the inability to communicate effectively."

For this reason, she says, she wrote 20 songs, many on an island in Thailand, about emotions – happy, fear, angry, tired, shy, silly, surprised, crazy, confused, hopeful, all alone, and love.

"Each song has an introduction, and there is kids' dialogue in between.

"Hopefully, this will give the child and teacher or parent an enjoyable approach into defining, clarifying and recognizing the nature of how we as humans feel."

Through music, she says, each individual can connect and utilize the CD as a learning tool to discover more about their emotions.

For information or to order Emotions, visit www.emotionsbook.com.

Jewish Travel Guide 2006 worth consulting

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Travel guides are a dime a dozen.

Publishers, capitalizing on the thirst for international travel, have been churning out innumerable guides in the past few years.

In a field where such guides seem uniformly identical, the Jewish Travel Guide 2006 (Vallentine Mitchell) is definitely different.

It contains basic information about kosher restaurants, delis, groceries, bakeries, synagogues, communal institutions and the like, plus a capsule, though wholly inadequate, history of every Jewish community in the world.

In entries running the gamut from Albania to Zimbabwe, readers will learn, for example, that the shul in Yerevan, the capital of Armenia, is located on Nar-Dosa St. 23; that the Jewish community centre in Borisov, Belarus, is found on 1-37 Stekolnaya; that the Jewish Museum in Sarajevo is housed in the city's oldest synagogue; that the telephone number of the kosher butcher in Copenhagen is 3918-5777; that the address of the shul in Tahiti is Rue Morenhouy, Papeete; and that the Israeli Embassy in Madrid is on Calle Velazquez 150, seventh floor.

The United States commands the biggest entry, with 122 pages, and Britain comes next with 36 pages.

Canada, though its Jewish population is considerably larger than England's, rates only 11 pages. Cities such as Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, Winnipeg and Edmonton are given pride of place.

If you look up Calgary, you'll find Izzy's Kosher Meats and Deli and Karen's Café. In Vancouver, you'll be guided to Pinis Pizza and Sabra Bakery, and in Halifax, your attention will be drawn to two synagogues, Shaar Shalom and Beth Israel, among other places.

With the summer travel season almost upon us, you will find the Jewish Travel Guide 2006, published in association with the Jewish Chronicle of London, England, a useful source.

It's a handy reference book you can use in conjunction with whatever general travel guide you've packed in your suitcase.

The Minyan: Second in the Trilogy of the Ackerman Family
Reading The Minyan was a true adventure from start to finish. The characters were alive and jumped out of the pages like a good friend. Each of the characters took on a life of their own and I seemed to become a part of the story.
From Gabe Garshowitz to Iris Forester, from Rachel Ackerman to Janusz Zwonarz, each character made the story move, and move excitingly, with their vulnerability and strength. The scenes from the death camps made a real impression on the brutality of that horrible period in history. The Minyan made one realize the pain and humiliation the victims felt and lived through and how revenge probably strengthened them to live through those horrific years. In the end, however, is revenge the answer? . . . that is what The Minyan brought home for all of us to contemplate. Can we ever go back and how do we face the future?

Leonard Cohen new and old

Book of Longing* by Leonard Cohen, McClelland & Stewart

Up to and including 1984's Book of Mercy, every poetry collection published by Leonard Cohen had a quality that might be described as uncanniness – each was like nothing else one knew. The books were surprising, strange and wholly readable.

Norman Ravvin

In his earliest work, there are lovely, lean lyrics. In his mid-60s output, there appears an unsettling and provocative irony aimed at love, politics and war. The hard-edged anti-poems of The Energy of Slaves (1972) presage a punk esthetic, a rejection of form and the luxuries of fame. And in Book of Mercy, his immersion in mysticism and religious fable is expressed in concise, subtle prose poems.

Everything – everything – in Cohen's poetic oeuvre up to the mid-1980s is indispensable for Canadian literature, though he was often misread, under-reviewed, and gradually, as his career progressed, thought of as a singer-songwriter first and a poet second.

Book of Longing bears only a slight resemblance to what has gone before. As its acknowledgment page notes, many of the poems and drawings collected in it "first appeared in the Leonard Cohen Files (www.leonardcohenfiles.com), a remarkable website out of Finland."

A look at the website suggests that the poems that first appeared online have been lightly edited for their appearance on paper, and much of the illustrative material on the website has simply been reprinted in Book of Longing. Notably, some of the illustrated poems, such as Dear Roshi, appear in colour on the web, and in black and white in the book. For web devotees, the Leonard Cohen Files includes such features as photos of Cohen's house on the Greek island of Hydra, old photos taken from his early songbooks, and a short bibliographic and discographic description of Cohen's prolific career.

The website, too, gives dates for some of the newer poems, which were written between 1997 and this year. Book of Longing shares some similarities with Death of a Lady's Man (1978). Both mix poetry and short prose pieces, so that the shape of things on the page is varied and unpredictable. Death of a Lady's Man received a rough ride from critics when it appeared, but it has aged well. It documents a crisis in the poet's life and work, in a lean, bitter tone, its language pared free of excess. The Absence of Monica is characteristic:

She's gone away
on the morning boat
My heart
was too young for her
Wind comes over the baker's house
sweet with branch of burning fir

Some of the poems in Death of a Lady's Man appeared as lyrics on Cohen's similarly named 1977 album, Death of a Ladies' Man, including the book's title poem, which showed up as a grandly epic song of failed love ("So the great affair is over…"). Throughout Death of a Lady's Man, Cohen laments the failure of his art, but with hindsight, both the poetry collection and its musical mate are successes – ironic portraits of the mysterious relationship between life, love and art, which are seldom matched in Book of Longing. The new collection's title poem begins this way:

I can't make the hills
The system is shot
I'm living on pills
For which I thank God
I followed the course
From chaos to art
Desire the horse
Depression the cart
I sailed like a swan
I sank like a rock
But time is long gone
Past my laughing stock

It is not only Cohen's language that has changed – somehow the cadences and wit have become more predictable, unlike the poems and song lyrics that came before – but the presentation of the writer's persona in these new works has become more overt, more obvious.

Many pieces in Book of Longing read like a poet's diary entries, and this may satisfy some of Cohen's readers. His periodic depressions are remarked upon, and a scattering of poems reveal his reasons for abandoning Mount Baldy and his spiritual teacher there (possibly the most famous contemporary Buddhist after the Dalai Lama), Roshi.

These are among the Cohen-related topics the media and many fans have been most curious about in recent years. What was Cohen doing up on that mountain; what did Zen practice entail for the son of a Montreal Jewish clothing manufacturer; and what did it all mean with regard to his poetry and songs? Book of Longing contains descriptions of his monk's existence, alongside drawings of Roshi, and a number of poems that deal with Cohen's abandonment of the ascetic's life:

I came down from the mountain after many years of study and rigorous practice…
I finally understood
I had no gift for Spiritual Matters.

Cohen celebrates his return to Santa Monica, Calif., to women, to good wine and food, to cigarettes, and even, in the odd amusing poem, to his youth:

When I was about fifteen
I followed a beautiful girl into the Communist Party of Canada …
They wanted to overthrow
The country that I loved

Old poems appear amidst the recent material – among them a 1975 lament for a "lost" day's wanderings "on rue St-Denis," – and there are strange, haunting evocations of what we might view as Cohen's heyday, his sojourn at New York's legendary Chelsea Hotel, where Dylan Thomas held court from an "overstuffed easy chair" in the lobby. Recalling Nico, the front woman for Lou Reed's Velvet Underground, Cohen laments, "She knew what I was doing. She knew who I was. And I long for her still. I will pick my way back through the boredom and irrelevance of the last few decades and tell you of a time when I was truly alive…"

But Cohen distances himself from the cultural high jinks of what he calls that "curtain time," with its avant-garde art, which he dubs "fashionable excrement," and the frauds who promoted it with their "poisonous medicine chest of Gotham cunning."

This bitter piece, near the midpoint of Book of Longing, might be seen as its keystone, the piece of granite atop a curving arch, without which the rest of the creation collapses. In it, Cohen acknowledges a time when he recreated himself as a great songwriter, and he acknowledges, too, the American influence behind his work.

This piece returns us to a time before Cohen went up Mount Baldy, to a time when he wrote great, great things.

Canadian rock star and wife forge a connection with Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Alan Frew, the Scottish-born Canadian who fronted one of Canada's most successful rock bands, Glass Tiger, doesn't shy away from talking about his spiritual connection to Israel and the salad dressing and kosher crouton company he and his wife started a few years ago.

But neither Frew, a five-time Juno Award winner and Grammy nominee, nor his wife Marcy Mihalcheon of Marcy's Salad Dressings & Croutons, is Jewish.

Frew's spiritual love affair with Israel began three years ago when he was approached by a corporate company that provided entertainment for international troops stationed in Egypt and the Golan Heights in Israel.

"It was a real eye-opener to see how our troops live and function over there," said Frew, who has also performed for troops in Bosnia and the North Pole.

He said when he was approached to perform in Israel and Egypt, he couldn't turn down the opportunity.

"[Israel's] history is just compelling. I was thrilled that we got to go to the Sea of Galilee. I'm not a religious man, but I am a spiritual human being and you can't be among that type of history and not somehow feel spiritually moved. There were a couple of evenings where I walked up and down the Galilee and just took it all in. It was awesome," Frew said.

"It was something I really wanted to do. Unfortunately, when I was in Israel, there were many danger zones and they wouldn't let us travel. We couldn't get into Jerusalem. In Tel Aviv, we were allowed to move around, but of course just being allowed to move around doesn't mean you feel safe to do it. I was disappointed with that, but I was so moved by the fact that... the balcony of my hotel room as I opened my doors, was the Sea of Galilee and it was absolutely awesome."

Frew, who was famous in the 1980s for songs such as Don't Forget Me (When I'm Gone), Someday and So Blind, added that sitting under the stars and looking out into the Sea of Galilee brought him closer to the idea of a higher power.

"Sitting quietly, looking over the Sea of Galilee, you would have to be brain dead not to somehow feel that energy. I certainly felt it. As I said, I'm not a religious man, but it certainly touched my soul as a human being and it humbles you and makes you think deeply about the time we have here," Frew said.

Surrounded by the beauty of Israel, he said he felt it was a "travesty" and "appalling" that Israelis are forced to live in war-like conditions, yet he admired their strength in living life to the full in spite of the threat of violence.

"In my limited knowledge, in my heart of hearts, I know that the people of Israel would chose a life of peace. That I do know.

"I didn't go deep enough to understand the Palestinian mindset because I'm not knowledgeable enough about it, but I do know that a lot of what seems to go on in Israel seems to be a reactionary thing," Frew said.

"I very much support the fact that I found a peaceful nation, and I only wish that we could go over there and be safe and travel. But I've just about had it with the one-too-many Islamic extremists who are screaming at me that they want me to die along with everyone else."

What impressed Frew the most, however, was that even in the face of the threat of terrorism, Israelis refused to let it run their lives.

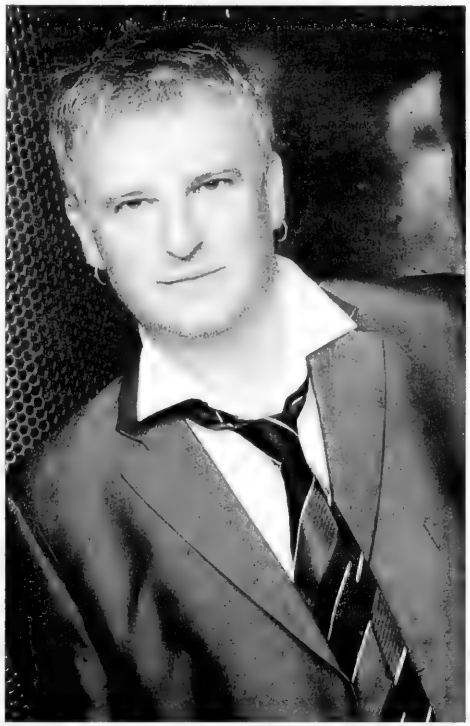
"One of the things I noticed when I was in Tel Aviv is the fortitude these people have, that they just will not let this stop their way of life. People were out and about having a great time – the weather was beautiful," Frew said.

"I believe in the power of the human spirit and I was thrilled to see... in the short time that I was there, that most people live like that. You have to move forward, you can't live under the cloud of fear."

* * *

While Frew was off in the Middle East making a connection with Israel, Mihalcheon was in the process of forging her own connection with the same country. She was busy developing and running the salad dressing and kosher crouton company she founded in 1999.

Not only have the croutons been certified by the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR), but the filling machines for both the salad dressing and crouton lines are Israeli units from an Israel-based company called Packline.



Alan Frew

She said the president of the company himself flew to Toronto to help install the machines.

"They were great people to work with," Mihalcheon said.

Since Frew encouraged her to bottle her homemade caesar salad dressing, which he said is unlike anything else he's tasted, Mihalcheon has developed four more dressings.

And her Calabrese crouton was voted the best new baked good at the Kosherfest in New York City.

Mihalcheon said she grew up in a Jewish community in Edmonton, and "felt that being kosher added a level of perception of quality to the product.

"Before we were kosher, we realized how many people had to walk away while we were doing demos."

She said that while the croutons are kosher, the salad dressings are not. However, her goal is to find the right ingredients to make her dressings kosher without having to compromise on the taste that her customers have become accustomed to.

"We are continuing to investigate the possibility and we're researching different companies that would be able to help," but she added that trying to make her salad dressings kosher has become a stumbling block.

She also said that the Kashruth Council of Canada and Rabbi Moshe Leibovits, the rabbinic coordinator, have been very helpful in trying to source kosher ingredients.

She said they are also getting ready to launch five new flavours of kosher croutons.

Frew, who does the music and voice-overs for the television and radio ads, said he is thrilled that she is getting the recognition for all the work she has put into her passion.

"It's really kind of cute how people are starting to identify me as Marcy's husband: 'Oh, you're that guy who's married to Marcy,'" he said.

He added that even when people do recognize him for his career with Glass Tiger, they say, "Oh, Glass Tiger – I love your wife's croutons."

Yo-Yo Ma teaches master class in Tel Aviv

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — Kettle drums roll like thunder, a melodious clarinet solo gives way to an oboe's clear call and Yo-Yo Ma looks at the Israeli student symphony seated around him and can't stop beaming.

"I am just overwhelmed by this orchestra," said Ma on May 24 as the Tel Aviv University (TAU) music students finish playing an intricate Ernst Bloch piece. But in this master class, he pushed them to play even better.

"Make the rhythm count as a huge pulsation from the ground up," he urged, enthusiastically bobbing on tiptoe.

One of the world's top cellists, Ma was in Israel to collect a $1-million (US) Dan David Prize for his work preserving cultural heritage in the Silk Road Project. Through concerts, festivals and teaching the project explores the commonality in music found in societies stretching from Asia through the Mediterranean, the overland trade route that helped spread not just products but ideas and cultures across the globe for centuries.

The prize, which Ma will be contributing to the project, is one of three awarded annually by Dan David, a Jewish philanthropist. The prize honours innovative and interdisciplinary research that in some way improves society.

"It is particularly fitting to have this conversation in Israel, a country infused with ideas and cultures brought by emigrants from Europe, Asia, Africa, and even the Americas. It is a society of ancient traditions and modern ideas whose culture is based in both," Ma said at the awards ceremony.

"Israel is a manifestation of the Silk Road and clearly illustrates that the more richly we understand the past, whether our own or our neighbours', the more brilliantly we can imagine the future. Here, as around the world, we are all neighbours culturally, and it is our shared past that will inspire what is to come."

To punctuate his point, Ma played two Bach pieces for the audience, including the Sarabande from Bach's fifth suite, whose melodies originated in North Africa and then travelled to Spain and France before the German composer, inspired by the sound, composed his own piece based on it.

At the May 24 master class, Ma played the solo in Bloch's Schelomo: Hebraic Rhapsody for Cello and Orchestra, accompanying the Buchmann-Mehta School of Music Orchestra.

He challenged the students to decipher what Bloch intended as he wrote the piece, which is based on scenes from Ecclesiastes.

"How does it feel?" Ma asked.

A percussionist suggested that some of the most dramatic movements of the piece reflected King Solomon looking back on some of the most difficult moments in his life.

"His life is running through his head," he said. Others offered their interpretation.

Ma seemed encouraged. "That's deep thinking," he comments, laughing.

He urged the students to tap into that internal pressure in the music to create a more emotional sound. He explained that to capture a feeling of anguish, it's important that the short notes that follow longer notes need to be as sharp and articulate as possible.

The orchestra once again played through sections, their sound improving each time.

Alon Azizi, 27, a contrabass player, was thrilled to have Ma as a teacher, even for just a few hours.

"I learned a lot about the musicality and the importance of focusing on details. He did a real deconstruction of the piece," said Azizi.

He was also very taken by Ma's warmth and accessibility. "His playing is so alive. He has the enthusiasm of a boy almost, he so loves the music."

After the class, clarinetist Danny Erdman, 22, cleaned the pads under the keys of his instrument and took in the moment. "He makes you think not just about what is written in the notes but the overall feeling of the music. That is the fun part of music that we sometimes forget about, that sometimes gets lost."

David, who has been awarding prizes since 2001, made his fortune from his invention of the automatic photo booth.

Other winners included two U.S. cancer researchers, John Mendelsohn and Joseph Schlessinger, who were honoured for their breakthroughs, as well as four journalists who have spoken out for press freedom, often at great personal risk: Magdi Allam of Italy, Monica Gonzalez of Chile, Adam Michnik of Poland and Goenawan Mohammed of Indonesia.

The Egyptian-born Allam, known for his outspoken criticism of Islamic extremism, received a standing ovation when he voiced support for Israel, proclaiming in Hebrew, "Am Yisrael chai."

Sports Book chronicles great Jewish athletes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There's a gag that's been circulating for years that pokes fun at stereotypically bookish Jews and their supposed aversion to sports.

You know the one, the joke about the world's smallest book – great Jewish athletes.

It turns out there is a book about great Jews in sports, but at 295 pages, it's not so small.

The Big Book of Jewish Sports Heroes (Specialist Press International) profiles the 150 greatest Jewish sports heroes and lists dozens more who have made marks for themselves in a variety of sports, from fencing to track to boxing to basketball – and there's even a handful of hockey stars.

Author Peter S. Horvitz, who also penned The Big Book of Jewish Baseball, spans the globe to bring the reader the best Jewish athletes of the past 250 years. Many sports and countries are represented – including Canada – but the selections tilt noticeably to the United States, with American professional sports such as baseball, football and basketball, along with boxing, accounting for the lion's share of athletes.

Still, the results are fascinating. Baseball and boxing pioneers are highlighted, along with prominent Jews from the early days of pro football and basketball.

Many of the names are familiar, such as Mark Spitz, Sandy Koufax (the top two athletes), Sid Luckman, Marv Levy, Dolph Schayes, Shawn Green and Ron Mix.

But you'll also find Irena Kirszenstein-Szewinka, a Polish runner who won medals in four consecutive Olympic Games, (three gold, two silver and two bronze) from 1964 to 1976; Dara Torres, a U.S. swimmer who won nine Olympic medals in four different Games, the last at Sydney at age 33; Walter Miller, one of horse racing's greatest jockeys; and Joe Choynski, a great early boxer who defeated a young Jack Johnson and then trained the future champ.

It's tidbits like that which make the book a fascinating read.

Sports enthusiasts will no doubt take issue with the order of Horvitz's selections – how is it that Olympians Kirszenstein-Szewinka (21st) and Torres (23rd) rank behind all-pro NFL lineman Ron Mix (15) or slugger Shawn Green (19)?

In addition to the top athletes, Horvitz lists the 100 greatest Jewish players in chess (there were eight world champions, including Mikhail Tal, Boris Spassky and Mikhail Botvinnik), top poker and billiards players and 30 great bridge players.

There are also lists of all Jewish Major League Baseball players, Jewish medal winners in all the Olympics (there were plenty), Jewish world boxing champs (lots in the first half of the 20th century) and Jewish NFLers and NHLers.

Some of the more fascinating aspects of the book are its profiles and historical essays. One features Elvis Presley as a Jewish athlete. The book says the King was Jewish through his maternal bloodline, and he was a capable – though not great football player.

Another item, titled "Anti-Semitism on the Rink," examines the events of March 7, 1968, when Philadelphia Flyer Larry Zeidel got into a stick swinging match with Boston Bruin Eddie Shack after several other Bruins taunted Zeidel with anti-Semitic slurs.

Finally, the book concludes with a 227-question quiz to test readers' knowledge of Jews and sport.

All in all, it's a fascinating read and well worthwhile for anyone interested in the athletic excellence of the People of the Book.

To test your knowledge of Jewish athletes, here is a sample of the quiz questions posed in The Big Book:

1. What baseball player was the first ever to be unanimously elected MVP?
2. What Jewish hockey player was a member of three Stanley Cup winning teams?
3. What baseball player was known as "SuperJew"?
4. Who was the first Jewish manager of a Major League baseball team?
5. What Jewish athlete won the most Olympic medals?
6. What Jewish player was part of the 1966 team that was the only English squad to win soccer's World Cup?

Answers:
1. Al Rosen, American League, 1953.
2. Alex Levinsky played on the 1931-32 and 1932-33 Toronto Maple Leafs and the 1937-38 Chicago Black Hawks.
3. Mike Epstein, who was a World Series winner with 1972 Oakland Athletics.
4. Lipman Pike in 1871.
5. Swimmer Mark Spitz, with nine gold, one silver and one bronze.
6. George Cohen.

Danger lurks – at the supermarket

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

New Views

The May 17–30 edition of the Community Link, a Jewish equivalent to the clump of advertisements and coupons that arrive with your weekly community newspaper, was pretty much true to form. There were ads for such things as kosher pizza parlours, maternity wear, quality linens and real estate agents – just what you would expect from such an advertisement-geared publication.

But on page 69, there was something different: a message from an organization called F.A.I.M.A.

F.A.I.M.A stands for Families Against Immodest Advertising, a recently founded Ortho-watch group. It took out a full-page ad in Community Link to advise the Jewish community about the latest step in an ongoing plan to ghettoize the Orthodox – or, as F.A.I.M.A would say, shelter the community from the dangers and filth of the non-Jewish world.

"Much effort is being invested on behalf of our community in order to maintain our sensitivities and protect our children from offensive advertising displays," the confusingly vague message began. "Thus, when visiting certain stores… members of our community are being urged to shop at designated aisles only. By doing so, they will be displaying their commitment to the values we hold so dear."

The message went on to specify that certain checkout lanes at your local Dominion and Fortinos supermarkets have been deemed "family friendly" (for those keeping score, aisles 1-6 at the former and 7-14 at the latter). The notice then ended with this: "Our Rabbanim have advised that one is required to use one of the above aisles."

This latest attempt at religious manipulation raises a few questions that other, more blatant attempts by rabbinic authorities and kashrut boards have at least been up front about. Who is this F.A.I.M.A? Who are these "rabbanim"? What do they consider "our community"?

The vagueness of F.A.I.M.A's message makes it difficult to decode, but here's the basic idea: the covers of magazines that we all eye while waiting on line at the grocery store – Cosmo, TV Guide, People and Seventeen – are polluting our religious minds and exposing Orthodox youth to things they shouldn't be seeing. Sex, women and television – that unholy trinity – are plastered all over these publications, and there's no way to avoid seeing them when waiting in line. This is, according to F.A.I.M.A, what we need to avoid – for our sake and the sake of our children.

Of course, on the surface, this looks like a straightforward, run-of-the-mill attempt to shelter religious people from the rest of the world. There have been a lot of these lately, ranging from decrees on how late popular restaurants can remain open on weekends to bans on an ever-growing list of fruits and vegetables amid advances in microscopic testing. It seems that just about every other week, something new is disallowed or deemed unkosher.

But while previous plots to self-ostracize the Orthodox community have always come from official organizations, this is a faceless attempt at religious exploitation by a mysterious group trying to solve a problem we never knew we had, with the support of rabbis they are unwilling to name. It makes perfect sense, then, that the F.A.I.M.A notice contains no number or address where readers can potentially reach the group for questions or comments. The intent is clear: no questions, no discussion. Just do as you're told.

F.A.I.M.A's message is a bold manoeuvre and a dangerous precedent that must not be permitted to take root. The stakes involved with religious edicts get much higher when every zealot out there thinks they've got the right to tell the rest of us what to do. Until this group steps forward to reveal who they are and what authority they possess, everyone should disregard page 69 of the Community Link. Once we know who or what F.A.I.M.A is, we can all decide how to respond to its message.

The Senior Side of Life column, "Not necessarily too old for surgery" (CJN, May 25), included an incorrect statement. It should have said, "I told him that getting a surgical opinion does not obligate him to surgery…"

The CJN regrets the error.

If not the rabbis, how the community?

By RABBI HOWARD MORRISON

In my six years serving a large congregation in Toronto, I have learned to admire the strength and vitality of this Jewish community. The choice and substance of synagogues, day schools, kosher restaurants, mikvaot, and the like is truly amazing. The significance of so many communal Jewish organizations is equally remarkable.

One of our community's strengths is its diversity. Never before have I been part of a community that offers something for everyone in such close proximity. For example, the availability of Reform, Reconstructionist, Conservative and Orthodox synagogues is unmatched anywhere else.

I learned a long time ago to admire diversity and not to fear it. I also learned that there can be Jewish unity without imposing Jewish uniformity. Unity means recognizing internal differences while staying in meaningful contact so that similarities and shared values outweigh competing understandings of Jewish law and its synthesis with modernity.

One of my favorite midrashim harks back to Passover. How could it be that the 12 tribes of Israel all entered the Sea of Reeds at the same point and emerged at an identical place after the sea split? The midrash answers that each tribe travelled in its own vault, but each vault was transparent so that each tribe could stay in contact and close to the others. Certainly, each tribe had its own distinctiveness and style. Each tribe would travel in the wilderness under its own banner. However, their overall connectedness displayed Jewish unity without sugarcoating internal differences.

In the Toronto area, rabbis representing different streams of Judaism get together with colleagues who share a common ideological or institutional point of view. The Vaad Harabonim (Orthodox), the Rabbinical Assembly (Conservative), and the Reform Rabbis of Greater Toronto meet regularly. These separate groups are important because they enrich the diversity of our community.

But where is the point of meaningful contact and unity?

The Toronto Board of Rabbis (TBR) is a longstanding umbrella organization that brings together Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, and Reconstructionist rabbis to address topics of mutual interest. Certainly, the rabbis who comprise the TBR disagree on many matters, be they theological, philosophical, halachic or otherwise. But their coming together in respect of each other allows them to explore and find amicable solutions to common problems.

To my chagrin, some communal organizations that seek rabbinic advice look to rabbinic groups other than the TBR for input. Such an approach makes little sense unless every denominational rabbinic group is equally recognized. I encourage communal agencies to consult with the TBR for rabbinic insight, since only the TBR includes rabbis from all streams of Judaism. The TBR is truly a community-minded gathering of colleagues.

I invite those rabbis who only affiliate with rabbis from their own stream of Judaism to also affiliate with the TBR. Rabbis need not agree on everything. But rabbis who care about the entire Jewish community should be willing to sit with each other, talk and listen with respect, and be open to exploring issues of mutual concern together. In this way, we can authentically blend the best of Jewish unity and diversity.

If not the rabbis, how the community?

No evidence terror suspects targeted Jewish institutions

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Senior officials with two Jewish organizations were told that there was no indication the 17 alleged Islamic terrorist arrested in Ontario over the weekend were considering Jewish targets.

However, two terrorism experts suggested the Jewish community should be concerned about the alleged homegrown terrorism plot, since Islamic extremists often include Jews on their hit list.

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Canadian office of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said he participated in an RCMP briefing in which it was made clear that "there has been no Jewish target." Authorities investigating the terror plot found "nothing regarding Jews specifically. The target was not a synagogue or a Jewish community centre or anything like that," he said.

The briefing took place at a meeting of the Cross-Cultural Roundtable on National Security, a multicultural group established 1½ years ago to assess the Anti-Terrorism Act, which has been incorporated into the Criminal Code. The 15-member cross-cultural group was meeting in Ottawa when the weekend arrests were announced, and the group was briefed by the RCMP for more than an hour. The roundtable group was told there were no indications Jews or Jewish institutions were targeted. The RCMP official also discounted reports that the TTC or the Parliament Buildings were on the terrorists' hit list, Adler added.

Canadian Jewish Congress president Ed Morgan said, "Our contacts within Toronto police and the Ontario Provincial Police have assured us there was no particular Jewish community target on these individuals' lists. Obviously, the Jewish community is as concerned as are all other Canadians about safety of our community and protecting public buildings."

More than 400 police and intelligence agents were involved in the arrests of 17 Islamic terrorism suspects – 12 men and five youths who cannot be identified – alleging they had plotted attacks in southern Ontario using bombs made with a chemical fertilizer.

Police seized material that could be used for a bomb, including a cellphone wired to a possible

Doc Lured to McGill

MONTREAL — McGill University has lured an American scientific and academic star to head its medical school. Dr. Richard Levin, currently a vice-dean at the New York University School of Medicine, will become McGill's vice-principal (health affairs) and dean of its faculty of medicine in September. Part of his mandate is to foster stronger ties with the community, including the private sector.

Campaign Sets Record

HAMILTON — Hamilton's 2006 UJA campaign is expected to raise more than $1,040,000, a new record, the Hamilton Jewish News reported. That exceeds 2005's $1-million haul, also a record, and comes after the drive got off to a slow start because of a delayed launch and a leaky roof at the building that houses UJA Federation of Hamilton.

Magazine Removed

TORONTO — Indigo Books and Music, Canada's largest book retailer, has removed copies of the June edition of Harper's Magazine from its 260 Indigo, Chapters and Coles book stores, saying an article in it could spark protests similar to ones earlier this year by Muslims angered at a Danish newspaper's publication of cartoons depicting the Prophet Muhammad. The 10-page article "Drawing Blood," by New York cartoonist Art Spiegelman – best known for his graphic novel about the Holocaust, Maus – reproduced all 12 Danish cartoons and included one by Spiegelman and two by Israelis that were inspired by an Iranian newspaper's call for cartoons questioning the Holocaust, Canadian Press reported. Indigo CEO Heather Reisman and her husband Gerald Schwartz are among the co-founders and board members of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy.

New Trade Group

OTTAWA — Business leaders from across Canada attended the launch last week of the new Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce at the residence of Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, in Ottawa. The Toronto-based group, headed by interim president David Rubin, aims to promote business opportunities for Canadian and Israeli firms beyond current bilateral trade levels of $1 billion.

WORLD

Pope Answers Critics

ROME — In what many saw as a response to Jewish groups' criticism for his not explicitly mentioning anti-Semitism during his May 28 address at Auschwitz, Pope Benedict XVI referred specifically to anti-Semitism and wartime Jewish suffering in a speech last week to a crowd in St. Peter's Square. "Today's humanity must not forget Auschwitz and the other factories of death where the Nazi regime tried to eliminate God in order to take His place," he said. "Humanity must not give in to the temptation of racial hatred, which is at the origin of the worst forms of anti-Semitism." After the Pope's Auschwitz address, the Anti-Defamation League's national director, Abraham Foxman, said, "Standing at the crematoria, the world's largest Jewish cemetery, the Pope uttered not one word about anti-Semitism" and "not one explicit acknowledgment of Jewish lives vanquished simply because they were Jews."

Chief Rabbi Assaulted

WARSAW — Poland's chief rabbi was punched and hit with pepper spray. The man who assaulted Rabbi Michael Schudrich also shouted, "Poland is for Poles," as the rabbi was accompanying several Shabbat worshippers out of a Warsaw shul May 27. Rabbi Schudrich tried to detain his attacker, witnesses said, but the assailant escaped. The U.S.-born rabbi wasn't injured. The attack came a day before the rabbi was to join Pope Benedict XVI on a visit to Auschwitz.

Iran Says Its President Will Skip World Cup

TEHRAN — Iran's president will not come to Germany for soccer's World Cup this month, an Iranian government spokesperson said last week.

Gholam Hossein Elham told Agence-France Presse that Mahmoud Ahmadinejad won't attend the tournament, in which the Iranian team will take part. Campaigns had been launched calling on Germany to bar Ahmadinejad from the World Cup, which begins June 9, because he has repeatedly denied the Holocaust and called for Israel's destruction.

In an interview published May 28 in Germany's Der Spiegel magazine, Ahmadinejad said he might attend the World Cup despite protests sparked by what he called a "worldwide network of Zionists." Germany's interior minister, Wolfgang Schauble, said Ahmadinejad would be welcome because Germany wants to be a good host.

Ahmadinejad also told Der Spiegel that Germany should stop feeling guilty about the Holocaust. "German people are prisoners of the Holocaust," he said, adding that "if the Holocaust happened, the Europeans must accept the consequences" and take the Jews back, as "the price should not be paid by Palestine. If it did not happen, then the Jews must return to where they came from."

Shavuot Pilgrimage

KIEV — Chassidic Jews celebrated Shavuot last week with a pilgrimage to a Ukrainian town considered to be the birthplace of Chassidism. About 1,000 Chassidim from different countries arrived in Medzhibozh, which contains the grave of the Ba'al Shem Tov, the founder of chassidic Judaism. Chassidim have been coming annually to the town since Jewish pilgrimages to Ukraine were revived in 1988, after the Soviet Union loosened restrictions on religious practice. Pilgrims are also expected to visit the towns Berdichev, Nezhin and Gadyach, also considered chassidic holy sites.

Construction Protested

ODESSA — The Jewish community of Odessa, Ukraine, is trying to stop construction in an area thought to be on or near the site of a wartime massacre. In 1941, the Nazis killed some 25,000 people, mainly Jews, in the area, which is marked by two memorials to Jews and Soviet prisoners of war who were killed. The work site is 300 yards from one of the memorials. A spokesperson for the mayor said it's far enough away from the memorial to make construction OK.

Neo-Nazi propaganda found on art Website

One posting states 'the gas chambers were in reality air raid shelters'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Rochelle Michaels has been a "deviant" for less than a year, but has become increasingly disillusioned with the online community she joined.

As one of the many of members of deviantART, a web-based community of artists and art lovers, she has scanned the site's postings to enjoy photo displays and to communicate with the artist. She so enjoys the opportunities afforded by deviantART, she is curating a photo exhibit on the site.

But in the course of her deviantART browsing (www.deviantart.com), she has come across postings from some of the site's 2.5 million members (worldwide) that concerned and shocked her – postings that promoted Nazism, that denied the Holocaust and that included "bigotry and racial slurs," she said.

She brought her concerns to the attention of the site's help desk, believing the postings violate deviantART's own etiquette policy against permitting bigotry and racial slurs, but has been unhappy with the response.

Other deviants, including a colleague in Israel, have also complained but Michaels believes they have run into the American "mindset" of tolerating the kind of material that would be beyond the pale in Canada.

On one occasion she cited, the help desk threatened to ban a 15-year old girl in Germany when she reacted heatedly with foul language to a neo-Nazi Web posting. The language seemed to violate the site's standards, but not the initial racist posting, she said.

Michaels has created a 62-page critique of deviantART's practices, detailing numerous postings and links she said are problematic. She has asked the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles to intervene and Rick Eaton, the centre's senior researcher and a specialist on Internet hate and terrorism sites, said the centre will send a letter to deviantART outlining the centre's concerns.

In the time between Michaels' initial complaints to deviantART and The CJN's press time, it appears that many of the more problematic postings cited by Michaels have been removed. Postings that included swastikas, that proclaimed the Latvian Legion (a SS unit) as "heroes" and others turn up a "file not found" response. A search for the deviant who posted many of the problematic sites turned up, "user no longer a member of deviantART."

Eaton said it is not uncommon that Internet providers "won't acknowledge a complaint, but do take [the offending posting] off quietly."

One posting that remained after many others were deleted was headlined, "the NSDAP (Nazis) and the Jews" and featured a black swastika on a map of the globe.

The posted "deviation" is written in a calm tone and repeats many neo-Nazi and "revisionist" claims – that "the gas chambers were in reality air raid shelters;" that "there is not the slightest proof that any program of mass extermination was carried out in these [concentration] camps at all"; that Treblinka and Sobibor were nothing more than transit camps; and there was no "extermination plan" as "Hitler never supported this idea as he had too much respect for life to order such a thing."

Eaton said "I appreciate Rochelle's concerns on this sort of material, but this is legal in this country. It's quite legal to deny the Holocaust and promote hatred." In the United States, a boundary is only passed if material incites actions against individuals, he added.

Rachel Reynolds, deviantART's publicist, said, "deviantART does not have a policy requiring the removal of Holocaust-denial material and the staff does believe it is protected by freedom of speech rules.

"The CEO and co-founder of this website, Angelo Sotira, is half-Jewish and personally feels very strongly about this type of propaganda and does not condone it in any way. He believes denying the Holocaust is a statement of utter ignorance and does not believe the site should encourage this point of view, however he also asks what good removing the

Serving their country and soul

Part 4 of the highlights from the International Conference of Jewish Newspaper Editors May 7 to 11 in Israel.

From the editor's desk

After our travelling troupe of tired yet wide-eyed Jewish editors visited with Rabbi David Hartman at the Shalom Hartman Institute, we continued farther south and east into the Jerusalem hillside to the educational complex run by the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) in Kiryat Moriah.

There we met with JAFI officials from whom we learned of the many educational programs for Israelis and foreigners that the agency runs. We met with young students from abroad, including a Canadian, participating in MASA/Israel Journey, a wide, umbrella initiative that offers a large variety of programmatic frameworks for youngsters wishing to spend more than 10 days of birthright israel or two months of summer exploring the Jewish state in greater depth and in the process, discovering more of one's self, too.

But the most poignant of all meetings in Kiryat Moriah was with four young Israel Defence Forces soldiers enrolled in NATIV, a special educational program, supported by the Agency, in which soldiers come to learn about their Judaism and their Jewish history. And they are not just any soldiers. They are new immigrants who are not halachically Jewish. Study at NATIV is part of the process they have freely chosen to become Jewish.

The close, small-room encounter with the young soldiers made achingly tangible the inspiring, yet abstract, words concerning Jewish identity imparted to us merely hours before by Rabbi Hartman.

In 1999, the Netanyahu government of Israel created a special Conversion Institute to oversee and administer conversions to Judaism. The establishment of the institute was the recommendation of Yakov Ne'eman, the chair of a committee charged with the responsibility of enshrining a conversion process in Israel that would placate all streams within Judaism. The Conversion Institute was not a perfect solution. But it was a sufficient compromise that the contending parties agreed to it with Benny Ish-Shalom – an appropriate name for an individual if ever there was one – chosen to be its head.

Ish-Shalom told us that "it was almost mission impossible to find acceptance among all the streams in establishing a governing board of directors for the institute. Decisions at all levels are made jointly. But we do not gloss over the difficulties." He believes he has gained the trust and support of all streams.

"No one is forced to become Jewish," Ish-Shalom emphasized. Since 1999, more than 18,000 individuals have enrolled with the institute. The conversion program for adults in civilian life takes from 10 to 12 months, or about 450 hours of study through the year.

Individuals in the army, however, go through the NATIV program.

NATIV has three components: seven weeks of morning and evening study; a 10-day seminar about one month after the conclusion of the first seven weeks and a decision is made to continue; then, a final 10-day seminar, again, about one month later. After the soldier completes all three stages, he or she converts through an IDF beit din. The course is open to all soldiers in the IDF who are new immigrants.

"Youngsters from the former Soviet Union comprise about 25 per cent of the soldiers in the IDF," Ish-Shalom notes. "They want to belong. We cannot reject them. We must embrace them and show them that, indeed, they do belong.

"The state must welcome all people of mixed families who want to tie their fate to ours. And to welcome all new Jews, we must create a conversion process that is friendly, respectful, that helps integrate new immigrants into the society and that is acceptable by all streams."

The four young soldiers whom we met all grew up believing themselves to be Jews. They want the Jewish state to believe that, too. They want to build their lives in Israel as Jews, and raise their families in Israel as Jews.

Ortal Mirkov came to Israel 12 years ago from Uzbekhistan. Her mother had converted to Judaism in Uzbekistan, but the Israeli rabbinate did not recognize the conversion "even though our entire lives we grew up and lived as Jews," she said. "When I heard about the NATIV program, I joined."

Max Voprovsky came to Israel 10 years ago from Ukraine. His maternal grandfather was Jewish. And his mother was always regarded as a Jew by their neighbours.

Yevgeney Shev-Lev came to Israel seven years ago from the Ukraine. His mother is not Jewish. But, like Max, everyone in his city always considered him a Jew.

Maya Nahor, a 20-year-old from Spain, is a lone soldier. Her father is Jewish; her mother is not. They live in Spain. "We were Jewish in the house, but outside, we were not", she said. "Don't tell people you are Jewish. They don't like that," she recalled her father saying. She intends to remain in Israel. She explained her gratitude at being able to enrol in NATIV: "All my life, I believed I was a special girl. Now I know it."

For these young soldiers, there was nothing theoretical or abstract about their Jewish identity. It was as real as an embrace from a long-sought friend.

Muslim-Jewish dialogue attempts to build bridges

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Akbar Ahmed and Judea Pearl returned to Toronto for Round 2 of the Muslim-Jewish dialogue in honour of Daniel Pearl, the Wall Street Journal reporter who was murdered in 2002 in Pakistan, after last year's dialogue left both communities disappointed and offended.

About 300 people gathered at the Islamic Iranian Centre of Imam Ali in Scarborough, Ont., to take part in the Daniel Pearl Dialogue for Muslim-Jewish Understanding.

Before the dialogue began, Zul Kassamali, the vice-president of the Association of Progressive Muslims of Canada, Leo Adler, the director of national affairs at the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies and Ron Smith, the immediate past president of Temple Har Zion, commented on last year's dialogue.

"We had the Pakistani Consul General who made a few remarks, very kind remarks, very proper, and the Israeli Consul General who perhaps cast a few stones," Adler said.

Last year, Israeli Consul General Ya'acov Brosh made statements such as "the majority of terrorists in the world today are Muslim" and that progressive Muslims like Ahmed "are a minority in the Muslim world today."

"After the dialogue, I spent a week working the phones," Smith said.

"I spoke with outraged Muslims and Jews. The Muslims were outraged, naturally, because they were insulted, and the Jews were outraged because our guests were offended in our house of prayer."

"But in the nature of the dialogue, we were determined to continue because that is what dialogue is all about," Adler said.

Pearl, a computer science and statistics professor at the University of California, began the dialogue – which was moderated by CTV News chief anchor and senior editor Lloyd Robertson – by talking about his son's passion of giving a voice to millions of voiceless Muslims from Iran to Sudan.

"His murderers schemed to [create] divisions among his peers and among us, but with all their sophistication, they made a crucial mistake," he said.

Now, Daniel Pearl, and the circumstance under which he was killed, serves as a constant reminder that violence and hatred is what will erode the fabric of humanity, added Pearl who founded the Daniel Pearl Foundation in April 2002.

Ahmed, an international relations professor at the American University in Washington D.C., said that after having recently spent two months touring 10 Muslim countries, his impression is that anti-Americanism and anti-Semitism is more prevalent in the Muslim world than even he imagined.

He said that he had participated in dialogues with large Muslim audiences and the popular sentiment was that America was on a warpath against Islam and the Jews are controlling America.

"I would have to explain to them that just as we would complain that Islam is not a monolith – that there are 4.5 billion Muslims, there are different ethnic groups, tribal groups, sectarian groups that divide the Muslim community – similarly, America and the Jewish community are not a monolith," Ahmed said.

"So, how do you deal with this wall of anti-Americanism and anti-Semitism? You cannot pretend it doesn't exist. It's the elephant in the room."

The solution, he said, based on his experience as someone very involved in the Muslim community, is to engage in dialogue that will change people's attitudes.

"We are aware that this dialogue leads to understanding of the nuances in our different faiths, and that, in turn, leads to friendship. When you have friendship, everything changes. We talk about Israel and the Palestinians. The reason it is going nowhere is because these two [sides] are talking to each other not as friends… but as enemies."

The majority of the question and answer period was spent discussing the Danish cartoon incident, which involved the publication of 12 cartoons depicting the Islamic prophet Muhammad in the Danish newspaper Jyllands-Posten last year, and the subsequent violent protests by Muslim communities.

"The Danish cartoons was a very sad incident," Pearl said. "It caused a further widening of the gap, a further polarization between the two communities," but, he added, as offensive as the cartoons were, it does not justify the violence that resulted.

But Ahmed countered by saying that after interviewing many Muslims, they unanimously said that the prophet Muhammad was their role model.

"I'm not surprised at all at the outrage. I'm only surprised by the surprise of the West. Are you serious about wanting to build bridges with the Muslim world or not?" Ahmed said to Pearl.

"No Muslim will compromise his love and reverence for the Prophet of Islam. That is at the centre of his belief."

He said that even the most secular Muslims get angry when speaking about the Danish cartoons and that if he was so insensitive as to make fun of Jewish symbols, he would expect a negative response as well.

But Pearl responded by saying that when Jewish symbols are used to make anti-Semitic statements, people don't resort to the kind of violence that escalated after the Danish cartoons were published.

The two scholars ended the dialogue with advice to the audience about what he or she can do to improve relations between the two communities.

"What you can do as an ordinary person is to understand that you are extraordinary. Each one of you can change the world. One man, one woman can take that step, like Judea Pearl. He took the step, he started a dialogue and he is changing the world," Ahmed said.

International Red Cross to vote on admitting Israel

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Changes to the Geneva Conventions that add the neutral red crystal to the red cross and red crescent humanitarian aid symbols of the International Red Cross do not guarantee that Israel can become a full member of the IRC, warned Alan Baker, Israel's ambassador to Canada.

What it does mean is that during conferences or when giving aid, Israel will display the Magen David Adom inside the crystal. In wartime, the crystal will be painted on vehicles or hospitals next to the Jewish star.

The measure to add the red crystal was adopted by the states party to the Geneva Conventions on Dec. 8, 2005, by no means unanimously, Baker said.

"All the Arab states, except Jordan, which abstained, opposed it." Syria, he said, tried to forbid the use of the Star of David at all on the Golan Heights.

In June, he said, there will be two conferences, one to amend the statutes of the International Red Cross Society to allow the red crystal, and the second to allow Israel, along with the Palestinian Authority, to join the society.

The neutral red-crystal symbol, Baker said, will apply not only to Israel but to any other group involved in humanitarian efforts that does not wish to use the red cross or red crescent.

Baker was speaking at Jerusalem Day celebrations sponsored by Canadian Magen David Adom, at the Sephardic Kehilla Centre in Thornhill.

Israel, Baker said, is counting on Canada to take the lead in supporting the adoption of the neutral symbol and accepting Israel as a full member of the IRC. The two countries "have the same values, the same immigrant population and commitment to fighting terrorism – Israel against Hezbollah, Canada against the Taliban."

He urged the audience to impress on the Canadian Red Cross and the government the need to stand behind Israel, and not allow Israel's enemies to politicize the situation.

Magen David Adom, he said, was founded 75 years ago, long before the establishment of the state, providing health and ambulance services to the Yishuv. "It was the backbone of Israeli relief, part of everyday public and military experiences, and in wartime an emblem of ambulances, medical shipping, helicopters and hospitals. It was a vital component of Israeli society."

It has been recognized internationally as being representative of Israel's humanitarian efforts – even by warring Arab states, although not by the Palestine Liberation Organization.

In 1947, Baker said, there was a proposal for the IRC to adopt four symbols: the cross, the crescent of Muslim nations, the lion and sun of Iran, and the Magen David.

For some "strange reason," Baker said, the proposal lost by one vote, when one delegate who had promised to support it, went to the washroom.

In 1949, he said, it was noted in the Geneva Conventions protocols as the emblem used by Israel.

Several presidents of the IRC have undertaken to end the discrimination against Israel, and the American Red Cross vowed, and has stood firm, to withhold funding until Israel is accepted as a full member.

With a Palestinian state seen as being in the cards and thus eligible for full membership as a red crescent state, it would leave Israel and the Jews as the only state outside the organization, Baker said,

"That," he noted dryly, "is not acceptable."

Vigilant abroad and at home

The details of the alleged conspiracy are still sketchy. As of this writing, the charges have not been fleshed out and the particulars outlining the alleged connections among the accused have not been released. Thus, we tread into commentary warily. But the arrest over the weekend of 17 individuals suspected of having plotted to commit acts of terror against Canadians was like the sound of heavy glass shattering at our feet: jolting and jarring.

And the shards of the shock cut even deeper because all of the suspects – 12 adults aged 19 to 43 and five minors – are Canadians. If the charges prove true, we must reconcile the irreconcilable: that Canadians were preparing to murder and slaughter other Canadians in Canada, that the enemy is not at a safe remove from our shores some thousands of kilometres away, but rather, that it is also at home, within our shores.

At the Saturday news conference, RCMP assistant commissioner Mike McDonnell said: "This group posed a real and serious threat. It had the capacity and the intent to carry out these acts." The capacity to carry out acts of terror, we presume, was established in the minds of the law enforcement authorities as a function of the arms and electronic devices they seized and the three tonnes of ammonium nitrate that had been purchased by members of the group.

As more of the details of the charges come to light, Canadians will rightly ask how such vile hatred could have become so deeply embedded here, among our own.

"They appear to have become adherents of a violent ideology inspired by Al Qaeda," said Luc Portelance of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, although he added that there was no evidence of a direct link with Al Qaeda.

What Canadians, however, must not ask is how did we bring this upon ourselves? Many people will seek to blame Canadian foreign policy for steering the alleged terrorists toward their intention to commit acts of terrorism. "Canada's participation in the 'American war' in Afghanistan" and "Canada's boycotting of the duly elected Hamas government of the Palestinian Authority," we will be told by the familiar root-cause apologists, have so enraged the hearts of the accused and people like them, that they felt compelled to act according to conscience, if not misguided beliefs. But this line of misreasoning must be rejected.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper succinctly explained why Canadians appear now to have also been targeted by jihadi terrorists: "We are a target because of who we are and how we live, our society, our diversity, our values – values such as freedom, democracy and the rule of law." He is correct.

We commend and thank the combined Canadian security forces for their vigilance abroad and at home.

25 years ago in The CJN

Egyptian President Anwar Sadat told Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin that Egypt would not interfere in a war between Israel and Syria. At a meeting in the Sinai, Sadat said Syria caused a crisis by deploying anti-aircraft missiles in Lebanon, and he said Egypt put its peace treaty with Israel before its commitments to Syria.

Proposed boycott of Israeli academics

We, the undersigned, are protesting, in the strongest possible terms, the proposed boycott of Israeli academics by Britain's National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education (NATFHE). This proposed boycott is wrong in principle for the following reasons:

1. NATFHE has singled out Israel and Israeli academics in particular, for such a brazenly discriminatory act. Institutions and organizations should eschew one-sided approaches to the conflict that single out Israel for discriminatory and differential treatment and place no responsibility at all on the other side (i.e., Palestinians and/or Arab states).

Israel is the only true democracy in the Middle East. We challenge NATFHE to find another country in the Middle East where freedom of speech is taken for granted and where a minority would be able to use the Supreme Court system to stop actions of the government that they deem unfair. Do other Middle Eastern nations allow members of a minority, many of whom demonstrate against the government, to sit in Parliament as does Israel? When there are so many other nations that actually do condone egregious human rights abuses, the singling out of Israel for censure is abhorrent and an abuse of so-called academic freedom.

2. Universities in particular have an obligation to uphold academic freedom and to encourage rational debate and discussion. Loyalty tests, McCarthy-esque blacklists and straitjacketed thinking undermine the free exchange of ideas that is the raison d'être of institutions of higher learning. In this regard, Israeli universities are open, vibrant and multicultural. It is particularly unconscionable for a teachers' association to urge a primary boycott – of Israeli universities and academics – on the basis of nationality and a secondary boycott – of academics that do not distance themselves from Israeli policy – on the basis of political ideology. This smacks of Orwellian groupthink at its worst.

We call upon the proponents of this boycott to recognize the blatant immorality of this position and reject it out of hand.

Eli Cohen

The tragedy of the torture and execution of Eli Cohen is a symbol of Syria's hatred toward Israel and the Jewish People ("Brother pleads for Syria to release remains of Eli Cohen," CJN, May 25).

Not only has the government of Syria refused to allow Cohen's body to be exhumed and buried in Israel, but the terrible part is that nobody, outside of the Syrian hierarchy, knows if and where he is buried.

Over the 28 years of my involvement with the secret rescue of the Syrian Jewish community, I asked every Syrian Jewish leader, when they finally got out of the country, if they had been to Cohen's grave, or if, at least, if they knew in which cemetery he was buried.

The answer was always negative. Each person told me that Cohen's body disappeared after he was executed. The community was not allowed to mourn him.

CUPE boycott of Israel

So now, the Canadian Union of Public Employees ("CUPE votes to boycott Israel," CJN, June 1), which hardly seems capable of governing its own affairs, considers itself capable of standing in judgment regarding the affairs of others. I would ask CUPE's leadership how Israel is so deserving of the honour, with so many egregious violators of human rights to choose from. Not the least of these are their Arab brothers themselves, who turned away from Israel's example of absorbing every last Jewish refugee into an already burdened infrastructure, from Europe, from the former Soviet Union, from Ethiopia, and from Arab states.

If they wish to boycott Israel, so be it. We expect them to immediately cease from using their cellphones and computers with the Windows XP operating systems or with Centrino chips, all products of Israel. We further call upon them, if, God forbid, any of those harbouring illusions of power are stricken with cancer, they should inquire about any Israeli contribution to their course of treatment before embarking on it.

After all, we wouldn't want the nobility of their cause to be tainted with hypocrisy.

A Jew in the German army

In Sheldon Kirshner's book review "The German army's role in the Holocaust," CJN, May 18), he mentions Field Marshal Erhard Milch's Jewish background. In 1941, I was working for the Jewish Refugee Committee in Lisbon, Portugal, and once every week we received from 50 to 60 Jewish people arriving directly from Germany with U.S. immigration visas. One family was observed visiting the German embassy in Lisbon a number of times. We called them in for questioning and were told they were related to Milch and he told them he would forward $1,000 (US) to them through the German embassy, which they did receive.

'Israel is mistaken if it thinks Hamas will ever change'

Interview with Magdi Allam

By KHALED ABU TOAMEH

Prominent Egyptian-born editor Magdi Allam, who has been living in Italy for the past 30 years, was in Israel last week to receive an award for his "exceptional journalistic work and commitment to freedom of the press."

Allam, 54, shared the $1-million Dan David prize with three other journalists Monica Gonzales of Chile, Adam Michnik of Poland and Goenawan Mohamad of Indonesia. The prizes were awarded at a ceremony at the Tel Aviv University campus.

The prize committee praised Allam "for continuously voicing his opinion against extremism and in favour of tolerance."

The committee members said Allam proves that "positive dialogue with moderate Islam is both possible and necessary."

Allam, who studied sociology at La Sapienza University in Rome, today serves as deputy editor of Corriere della Sera, Italy's largest newspaper.

Over the past few years, he has won the admiration of many in the West for his open and daring criticism of radical Islam. In his writings and public appearances, he has even gone as far as attacking what he describes as the weakness of the West in the face of radical Islam.

In an interview with The Jerusalem Post, Allam expressed deep concern over the emerging alliance between Muslim fundamentalists and extremists living in Europe.

He also warned Israel against believing that Hamas would one day change its radical and dangerous ideology. Hamas's terrorism against Israel, he explained, is ideological terrorism. "They simply want to destroy Israel and that's all," he said. "That's why there's no point in talking to them."

Jerusalem Post: Do you think the international community and Israel are doing the right thing by boycotting the Hamas government?

Allam: I believe it was a big mistake in the first place to allow Hamas to participate in the election, because it's a terrorist organization that does not recognize Israel's right to exist and does not abide by any agreements.

Jerusalem Post: What about the belief that Hamas may change its strategy now that it's in power?

Members of the Hamas government pose after they were sworn in at the headquarters of the Palestinian Authority president in Ramallah on March 29, 2006. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Allam: If Hamas wants to change, it should have done so before the election. It's a grave mistake to think that such a change could happen after its victory in the election.

Today we see that it was a big mistake to permit Hamas to participate in the election because it has not changed, and will not change, its position. In the best case, it would agree to a long-term hudna (ceasefire) with Israel. But that does not mean it will ever accept Israel's right to exist.

When it talks only about a hudna, it is actually saying that it doesn't recognize Israel's right to exist. It's not talking at all about peace and a just and permanent solution, as we all want for the sake of the two people.

Jerusalem Post: But isn't a hudna better than violence and bloodshed?

Allam: What does a hudna mean? From an Islamic point of view, the hudna only means a temporary cessation of war activities. It is based on the Hudaibiyah example, when the Prophet Muhammed preferred not to enter Mecca. He waited for one year to prepare new forces to invade Mecca and occupy it. This hudna does not mean recognition of the other side and its right to exist. It only means winning some time to prepare for achieving what they really want. When we examine Hamas' ambitions, we see that its constitution calls for the destruction of Israel and the establishment of an Islamic state based on sharia law. I don't believe we can allow Hamas to reach its goal, because this means the destruction of Israel. And it would also harm the Palestinians themselves. Hamas' strategy won't lead the Palestinians to statehood and peace based on coexistence alongside Israel.

Jerusalem Post: Many Palestinians say there is no alternative to Hamas and that they would not vote for Fatah because of corruption and abuse of power. Do you think it's a good idea to bring down the Hamas government under the current circumstances?

Allam: I believe that we should criticize the lack of democracy and the corruption that existed in the Palestinian Authority under Yasser Arafat. But we can't deny others the right to live. This is a basic right for all people and it's non-negotiable. By denying Israel's right to exist, we are causing a lot of harm to both Israelis and Palestinians.

There is no alternative to peace between Israel and the Palestinians, one that is based on a two-state solution where both people live next to one another peacefully. The solution begins by recognizing Israel's right to exist.

There's a majority on both sides that believes in the two-state solution. The biggest obstacle to peace and coexistence is Palestinian terrorism that seeks to destroy Israel. Terrorism harms not only Israel, but the Palestinians as well.

Jerusalem Post: How serious do you think are the reports about al-Qaeda and other Islamic terrorist groups moving to the West Bank and Gaza Strip?

Allam: Hamas, al-Qaeda, Hezbollah and Iran all share the same ideology of violence, terror, death and denying Israel's right to exist. They resort to terrorism to achieve their goals. We live in a world that is united in many ways through economy, information and technology.

Unfortunately, there is also another kind of unity between those who believe in the ideology of force and violence. This is an ideology that is based on strong opposition to the United States, the West and Israel. It is based on radical Islam, and its followers are responsible for the terror bombings in Iraq and Britain. Israel has also been targeted by extremists in Europe who have allied themselves with radical Islam, when two British nationals of Pakistani origin carried out a suicide bombing in Tel Aviv in 2003. We must pay attention to this dangerous phenomenon of Westerners finding a common ideology with radical Islam.

Jerusalem Post: How do you think Israel and the West should respond to the Iranian threat to develop nuclear weapons, and calls by its president to destroy Israel?

Allam: Iran is a main threat to stability and security in the world. When Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmedinajad talks about his intention to acquire the nuclear bomb and at the same time to destroy Israel, he is assuming the role of the new Adolf Hitler and the head of a Nazi Islamic regime. He is a threat not only to Israel, but to Arab countries, especially in the Gulf. Iran is a real threat that should be dealt with instantly. We must stop this mad regime. If all the diplomatic initiatives fail to convince Iran to abandon its efforts to obtain the nuclear bomb, there will be no other choice but to launch a military strike.

Jerusalem Post: What, in your opinion, is the best way to stop the rise of Islamic fundamentalism and terror?

Allam: Today, the modern world must stick to the principle of the right to life and liberty for all. This is what human civilization is about. We cannot accept any compromise on this principle. Israel is making a big mistake if it thinks Hamas will ever change. This week, I read an interview with Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh in an Israeli newspaper in which he said he was prepared for a hudna if Israel withdrew to the 1967 borders. The talk about a hudna only confirms Hamas' long-standing position that it is opposed to Israel's right to exist.

Magdi Allam

It would be a big mistake to think these statements reflect flexibility and pragmatism on the part of Hamas.

Israel must stick to its principles, because this is the only way to guarantee its right to exist. There is a global war between those who deny the others' right to exist and those who carry the ideology of violence and terrorism. It's a struggle between civilization and radical Islam and terrorism. Muslims are the biggest victims of the terrorist attacks. True, Muslims are the ones carrying out most of the attacks, but the majority of the victims are Muslims in Iraq, Algiers, Jordan and other countries. The civilized world must not give up on the right to life for all. If we exclude Israel, we will open the door wide for terrorism against all of us.

The march of the future

It's a bizarre place to take a group of high school students. On this year's March of the Living, I travelled with teenagers to Poland and Israel.

It was a gut-wrenching journey. An itinerary that includes ghettoes, concentration camps and death camps is gruesome, even for people with thick skins. So why were 16-year-olds visiting these sites in Poland?

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

We went because we had to go. No one wants to visit some of the most horrific places on earth. But for Jews, history is current events. Year after year, we sit at the seder and recount the Exodus from Egypt. Even though 3,300 years may have passed, the Exodus is still our story, one that reminds us who we are. Certainly, the most recent chapters of that story, the Holocaust and the State of Israel, cannot be ignored. And so we travelled to Poland and Israel, on a journey to reconnect with our history.

In some ways, 60 years ago could not be more distant. Yet there they were, a group of comfortable 21st-century teenagers with iPods, cellphones and digital cameras, confronting the unimaginable. At first, many of them found it difficult to feel sad. They simply couldn't grasp what they were seeing. It was too foreign, too unbelievable.

That changed when the survivors began to speak. Six survivors, eyewitnesses to the Holocaust, were travelling with us. As we heard their stories of suffering and survival, everyone's tears flowed.

The survivors, all senior citizens, did not come along to serve as guides. They came back to Poland – one last time – to offer testimony on behalf of the six million. It was their last chance to make sure future generations do not forget.

These teens may not have realized it, but they are the last generation to hear eyewitnesses to the Holocaust. As time marches on, fewer and fewer survivors remain. Ultimately, we will be left with witnesses of witnesses, and these teens are the ones who will retell the story of the Holocaust in the future.

When I returned, a student asked me if there will there be a March of the Living 50 years from now? Will people still care about this story?

My answer was simple: "It's in your hands. You will decide whether future generations remember the horrors of the Holocaust and the miracles of Israel. You will decide if future generations know what it means to be a Jew. The future of the Jewish people is in your hands."

On the March of the Living, I saw the Jewish future. I saw a group of ordinary teenagers learn about Judaism with idealism and intensity. I am proud to know them, and I can't think of better people to entrust with the Jewish future.

What we can learn from l'affair Yehoshua

The only surprise about the recent A.B. Yehoshua brouhaha was that the Israeli novelist's rantings at the American Jewish Committee's recent centennial celebration surprised anyone. For years, Yehoshua – who said Jewish life is experienced more completely in Israel than anywhere else – has dismissed Diaspora Jewry as sterile, neurotic, and unfulfilled, while claiming that simply living in Israel makes Jews authentic. In inviting Yehoshua, the organizers chose a big name over good taste, and they got what they deserved.

Gil Troy in Montreal

I would respect Yehoshua's Diaspora rejectionism more if he also rejected the royalties and honours he receives from his benighted brethren. He may flatter himself that his American gravy train consists mainly of Christians fascinated by his creativity. Yehoshua's worldwide meal ticket validates Achad Ha'am's late-19th-century cultural Zionism, envisioning Jewish life centred on Israel with its revived Hebrew culture. Yehoshua's novels make him one of the glittering spokes linking Israel, the centre of Jewish life, with the periphery dispersed along the worldwide wheel of the Jewish Diaspora. As with most celebrities, it's better to read Yehoshua's novels than hear him speak about contemporary issues.

More disturbing is Yehoshua's lazy approach to Judaism, which has helped raise a generation of Israeli pagans. Living among a Jewish majority, on Jewish time in the magical, historically Jewish space called Israel is great. And many Israelis who call themselves chiloni (secular) don't realize how deeply Jewish they are with their fluency in Hebrew and the Bible. Likewise for the overwhelming numbers of Israeli Jews who believe in God, eat Shabbat dinners with their families, sit shivah when tragedy strikes, and ate cheesecake and blintzes in celebrating Shavuot last week, while most Diaspora Jews have never even heard of the holiday. Still, as one of my teachers, Prof. Deborah Weissman, notes, many Israelis have content without consciousness, while many North American Jews have consciousness without content – and Judaism requires both.

On June 19, the 35th World Zionist Congress will convene in Jerusalem. How to sing a new, positive relevant song of Zion for Jews both in Israel and abroad should be the real concern, rather than divvying up spoils for Israeli political hacks. We Zionists should be broadening our base, not making our club more exclusive. Saying "I am a Zionist" in the Diaspora is an act of triple-chutzpah. We risk the opprobrium of anti-Zionists who libel Zionism as racism; of Diaspora Jews who, because of rude Israelis like Yehoshua, label Zionism doctrinaire, fanatic or passé; and of Israelis such as Yehoshua, who sneer that Zionists cannot live outside of Israel, while younger Israelis consider Zionism anachronistic nonsense.

With Jews worldwide focusing on Israel these days, this is an opportunity for Zionist renewal. The Zionist movement began in the Diaspora to solve the 19th-century Jewish problem and help Jews reconcile the modern secular world with Jewish tradition. Moreover, just as living in the Diaspora does not preclude you from being a Zionist, living in Israel is not enough to make you a Zionist. The Jewish state includes Israeli Arabs, Orthodox extremists and post-Zionist intellectuals who all reject the ideology.

We need to define Zionism – and Israel – as solutions to our modern Jewish problems. We need to see Israel as an inspiration to Jews everywhere, pushing Jews in Israel and abroad toward a more meaningful, more relevant engagement with tradition as a guide for navigating modern life. We need to approach Zionism – meaning Jewish nationalism – as a conceptual framework, building on Jews' still strong feeling of history, ethnicity and common destiny toward a deeper Jewish identity.

Zionism can give our sense of tribalism transcendence by offering an alternative values system to contemporary materialism and selfishness. Zionism explains Jews' sense of family, this connection that stimulates altruism and links Jews together in joy and sorrow. A thoughtful, critical Zionism can help us see the neurotic aspects of Diaspora life and fix them, not just wallow in them. A thoughtful, critical Zionism can also help us see the flaws in Israeli life and try to fix them, not just mindlessly defend them.

In our world of multiple identities and multidimensional paradoxes, we can still yearn for the ingathering of the exiles without negating those who have not yet returned. In that way Zionism, like Judaism, helps challenge us, stretch us, complete us, acknowledging that despite our human imperfections, we strive to improve ourselves and our communities.

The danger of famous writers

When Israeli novelist A.B. Yehoshua startled his audience last month at the opening of the American Jewish Committee's two-day symposium on the future of the Jewish people by asserting that only Israel, and not Diaspora Judaism, can determine a meaningful Jewish future, he set off a flurry of discussion in Israel and North America.

Cultural commentators, journalists, intellectuals, rabbis and bloggers on both continents took him on, disagreeing or agreeing passionately. Yehoshua himself published a long article in the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz expanding on his remarks. Several days later he publicly issued "deepest apologies" for the "distress" that the "tone" and "content" of his remarks caused his audience. But he emphasized that he stood by them.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

I was reminded of the first time I met Yehoshua. I was taking a course in Hebrew literature at Brandeis University taught by a dynamic Israeli professor named Yehuda Friedlander, who was on sabbatical from Bar Ilan University. He had prevailed upon Yehoshua to speak to his class and to meet with his graduate students.

I recall the frisson of being in Yehoshua's presence. It was in the late 1970s and although he was at a relatively early point in his career, he was already regarded as an important Israeli author. He spoke to a group of students who were rapt in their attention as students can be. I can no longer recall the gist of his talk, but he made one statement that has kept the encounter and the context vivid in my memory.

Yehoshua was discussing Israeliness, Diaspora, and Jewish identity. He told us that religious observance was no more than onanut ruchanit, spiritual masturbation. I remember being disturbed by Yehoshua's statement – by the crassness of the metaphor, of course, but more so by the utter denigration of Diaspora Jewish life, and by the wholesale dismissal of religious Judaism – whether in Israel or elsewhere – as being inauthentic and meaningless. That Karl Marx might dismiss religious belief as an "opiate" was one thing, but for an Israeli author to declare it meaningless to the Jewish experience was quite another.

In retrospect, it could not have been lost on the author that many of the young men in the class wore kippot, and that almost all of us listening as he spoke in Hebrew at an American university owed our facility in the language to years of instruction in religious day schools. And it surely was not lost on Yehoshua that the professor who invited him into his class wore a kippah. Yehoshua's delight in deliberate abrasiveness remained with me, and I brought it always into my reading of his fiction.

In the late 1970s, Yehoshua was still considered a young, rebellious author, an enfant terrible. By now an éminence grise, his talk at the AJC and his subsequent reflections on the ensuing controversy proves that he is no less the agent provocateur.

By now, almost everyone who writes on Jewish and Israeli culture has weighed in on l'affair Yehoshua: Avraham Burg, Shulamit Aloni, Natan Sharansky, Yossi Beilin, Leon Wieseltier, Abraham Foxman and many others have parsed, picked bones with or hailed his remarks. There is no need for me to add my view of Yehoshua's remarks.

Instead, I'd like to offer a few words about the dangers of inviting illustrious authors to speak at public functions. Keynote speakers are invited to functions to inspire their audience, to bring people closer and affirm shared values, and to make them feel good about the organization that has gathered them together.

But good writers don't believe it's their job to make people feel good. They aim to disturb the equilibrium of their audience, to provoke thought, to unravel what we complacently thought we knew but have not sufficiently examined. Through the seductions of fine language, enticing characters and engaging plot, they entice us to confront what disturbs us and what we had pushed from consciousness.

However one feels about Yehoshua's views, the issues he raises – Jewish identity in North America and in Israel, the gap between large numbers of Israeli Jews and Diaspora Jews, the migration of Israelis and North Americans to one another's countries – are vexed issues that we must confront as we enter the 21st century. The terms are not quite as simple as most of Yehoshua's detractors and admirers have made it seem.

The Kirshner File

Spectre of fitna haunts the Palestinians

In the lexicon of Palestinian politics, one Arabic word above all others inspires a sense of dread: fitna, or civil war. Yet in the past few months, ever since Hamas coasted to victory in the Palestinian legislative election, defeating Fatah by a wide margin, this spectre has begun to haunt the Palestinians. Violence has flared as rival militias have clashed in the Gaza Strip and political infighting has erupted as Fatah and Hamas jockey for power.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Last January's election in the Palestinian Authority set the stage for the current tensions bedeviling the Palestinians in Gaza and the West Bank. Fed up by rampant corruption, financial mismanagement, lawlessness, lack of transparency and cronyism in the Fatah-dominated PA, Palestinians handed Hamas – the Islamic Resistance Movement – an overwhelming but totally unexpected mandate to reform the system.

According to surveys, Palestinian voters neither rejected a two-state solution nor a peace agreement with Israel, concepts that Hamas has yet to embrace and internalize.

The disconnect between Palestinian attitudes on coexistence and Hamas' refusal to acknowledge Israel's very existence placed Fatah on a collision course with Hamas (whose military wing has taken credit for most of the suicide bombings in Israel in recent years, but has adhered to an informal but shaky ceasefire).

Less than two weeks after the Jan. 25 election, the first sign of acrimony surfaced as a Fatah leader warned Hamas that its uncompromising stance on Israel would have dire consequences.

On a visit to Cairo in early February, Moussa Abu Marzouk, the Lebanon-based deputy leader of Hamas, declared that the PLO leadership had erred by recognizing Israel under the 1993 Oslo accords. Responding to his comment, the PA's acting finance minister, Jihad Wazir, said that Hamas had to readjust its views in the interests of preventing a collapse of the Palestinian economy.

As it happened, Wazir's veiled threat was a harbinger of things to come. On Feb. 18, when the Hamas government was officially installed, Fatah veteran and PA President Mahmoud Abbas told the Palestinian parliament in Ramallah that statehood could only be achieved through talks with Israel. Lest he be misunderstood, Abbas added, "The presidency and the government will continue to respect our commitment to the negotiations as a strategic, pragmatic political choice."

Abbas, of course, was referring to the road map to peace, a plan conceived and adopted by the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations in 2003, but never implemented.

As if to denigrate Abbas' declaration of principles, Ismail Haniya, the incoming Hamas prime minister, underscored the "points of disagreement," while Mushir al-Masri, Haniya's spokesman, observed that negotiations with Israel "are not on our agenda." Taking note of these statements, Rawhi Fattouh, Fatah's outgoing speaker of parliament, asserted, "The crisis has already started on the political level."

On May 25, against the backdrop of further armed clashes between Hamas and Fatah gunmen, Abbas brought tensions to a head with an unprecedented ultimatum.

He gave Hamas just 10 days to agree to a proposal, drafted by Fatah and Hamas prisoners in Israeli jails, to implicitly recognize Israel's pre-1967 borders within the context of a two-state solution, or face a referendum on the issue within 40 days.

In all probability, Abbas issued the ultimatum out of sheer frustration with Hamas, which, at best, would accept a long-term truce with Israel. Only a week before, Abbas had urged the European Union – the PA's largest donor – to give Hamas "a chance to adapt" to realities and end its freeze on aid to the PA. In concert with the United States and Canada, the EU halted payments to the cash-strapped Hamas government in March due to its refusal to renounce violence, recognize Israel's right to exist and accept previous accords with Israel.

Mahmoud Zahar

Reacting to these demands, Haniya said, "We will not recognize the legitimacy of the occupation, we will not renounce resistance and we will not recognize unjust agreements." Mahmoud Zahar, the Hamas foreign minister, and Khaled Mashall, its exiled leader, were just as adamant. Zahar, whose Gaza home was bombed by Israel three years ago, ridiculed a referendum as "a waste of time and money." Mashaal, the object of a 1997 Israeli assassination attempt in Amman, Jordan, said, "We are determined to stick to our national principles."

It remains to be seen whether Abbas will ultimately act on his ultimatum to hold a referendum. But if public opinion polls are correct, the vast majority of Palestinians in the territories are ready to accept Israel. In a recent survey, Near East Consulting, a Ramallah company, found that 88 per cent of respondents would support the so-called prisoners document, signed by, among others, Fatah's Marwan Barghouti and Hamas' Abdel Khaleq al-Natsheh, two of the most prominent Palestinians in Israeli prisons.

Mahmoud Abbas

(Israel, like Hamas, rejects the document, ostensibly because it has no intention of returning to the pre-1967 frontiers. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has outlined a plan to annex major settlement blocs in the West Bank, maintain a military presence in the Jordan Valley, finish the separation barrier that juts deeply into the West Bank in some places and retain much of eastern Jerusalem.

Ismail Haniya

(Meanwhile, Israel attacks Qassam rocket launching sites in Gaza. Since Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza last summer, Palestinian radicals have fired hundreds of Qassams at Israeli settlements near Gaza, causing property damage and wounding a small number of Israelis.)

It seems clear that, on ideological grounds, Hamas will continue to reject the prisoners' proposal. A two-state solution does not suit an organization whose objective is an Islamic state in all of historic Palestine on Israel's ashes. But if Hamas works to subvert a referendum, internal fighting is likely to resume.

During the month of May, pitched battles pitting Hamas against Fatah claimed the lives of nearly a dozen Palestinians in Gaza. Several clashes broke out after Hamas deployed a new security force in a daring challenge to Abbas' authority. In two instances, high-ranking Fatah intelligence officers were injured and killed by powerful bombs. Prior to these incidents, Fatah sympathizers in Gaza began boycotting Hamas-controlled mosques, highlighting their mutual animosity.

Fatah's deteriorating relationship with Hamas is also a function of an old fashioned power struggle and of concerns voiced by Abbas that Hamas' rejectionist policies will exacerbate the economic crisis in the PA.

Since the PA election more than four months ago, Fatah has taken bold and provocative steps to consolidate its base.

On Feb. 5, Abbas announced that he would transfer responsibility for all Palestinian security forces to his office. By way of reaction, Hamas published a statement opposing the move. The following day, Abbas said that he would be in charge of all diplomatic contacts with Israel.

Stunned by these developments, Hamas warned Abbas not to try to reshape Palestinian institutions without consultations. But on Feb.13, only five days before Hamas took over the government, Fatah legislators gave Abbas permission to appoint a new constitutional court, which will serve as the final arbiter in disputes between himself and Hamas.

Emboldened by his sweeping new powers, Abbas placed the official Palestinian media newspapers, radio and television – under his personal supervision. But on March 7, Hamas voted to strip Abbas of these powers.

In early April, nonetheless, Fatah assumed control over Gaza's border crossings into Israel. Subsequently, the Fatah-dominated PLO demanded that Hamas co-ordinate all diplomatic moves with Abbas.

In another sign of worsening tensions, Abbas, on April 21, blocked a Hamas government decision to appoint a well-known militant to a senior security position in Gaza. The appointee, Jamal Abu Samhadana, was head of the Popular Resistance Committees, which, along with Islamic Jihad, has launched Qassam rockets at Israel. On April 24, Abbas was at it again, claiming that he has the authority to remove the Hamas government.

These disputes have greatly aggravated stresses and strains in the PA, yet Abbas insists that a civil war is hardly imminent. But a fitna, with all its murky ramifications, may yet convulse the Palestinians.

Visionary couple helps vulnerable women escape abuse

Generous gift to UJA Federation allocated to JF&CS's Women Abuse Program

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

Spousal abuse is an often ignored social challenge in the Jewish community, one that usually hides in the shadows of denial. But one Toronto couple has no difficulty looking the problem straight in the eye.

Inspired by UJA Federation Campaign 2006, Lewis and Charlotte Steinberg recently donated a special gift of $100,000 to UJA Federation for the Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) Women Abuse Program, for another staff person who will assist abuse victims.

The Steinbergs hope that their gift will encourage abused women to come to JF&CS for help and enable them to leave troubled relationships. "A lot of women are embarrassed and ashamed that they're in this situation," says Charlotte Steinberg. "Sometimes these women think it's their fault, but it isn't."

Charlotte and Lewis Steinberg

"This represents a donor stepping forward to make a difference in the life of the Jewish community," says Dr. Richard Cummings, executive director of JF&CS. "It was visionary of them. We have to first recognize the existence of this problem in our community. Acknowledge it and respond to it."

According to Cummings, the Women Abuse Program will assist approximately 400 women in the coming year. It also serves children and men affected by abusive relationships.

"This donation has allowed us to expand and enrich our support to vulnerable women and children and their families," says Cummings.

"The staff is carrying enormous caseloads," adds Debbie Feldman, supervisor of the Women Abuse Program. "This way we can give service in a timely fashion." Feldman hopes that the agency will also be able to add a drop-in centre for abused women.

The Women Abuse Program provides a spectrum of services, including crisis intervention, assessment, and counseling. The additional funds have allowed JF&CS to enhance its assistance to abuse victims in navigating what Cummings calls "a complex and not always welcoming system," referring them to lawyers, social assistance, and housing. JF&CS also partners with Jewish Women International on emergency housing.

"All of these services will be enhanced and enriched through the donation of this family," says Cummings. "It's a donation that makes a significant difference, and has impact on the ground."

Feldman notes that it's important for abused women to receive these services within their own community. "It's really important for our community to acknowledge that these problems exist within," she says.

"This gift is going to give women the opportunity to remove themselves from abusive relationships," says Feldman. "It's going to give them the opportunity to reach the potential in themselves and raise healthy children who can contribute to the Jewish community in non-violent ways."

Whirlwind mission takes participants to Greece, Israel

"The Jewish community is not alone. We're one big family." That thought kept coming back to Alan Gozlan, co-chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's recent Prime Minister's Mission to Israel and Greece. Gozlan and co-chair Jeffrey Rubenstein led 37 top donors on the 10-day May trip.

In Greece, participants visited Athens and Thessalonica. The itinerary included a special tour of the Acropolis and the Partheon, Jewish museums, synagogues and Holocaust museums. But, for many, meeting members of the local Jewish communities — including a dinner at the home of Israeli Ambassador Ram Aviram—was equally moving.

Thessalonica was the first Jewish community in Greece to feel the wrath of the Nazis who, in April, 1941, started discriminatory policies against the Jews as a prelude to arrests, deportations and killings. "Because of what happened during the Second World War, this once vibrant and thriving community was all but annihilated," says Gozlan. "The fact that we went and lent our support to them meant a great deal to them and a great deal to us."

"Thessalonica was incredible," says Karen Morton. "The community was warm and inviting. We were the first mission to ever go there."

In addition to meeting with the president of the community and other local leaders, the Torontonians met with seniors at a retirement home and visited a day school.

In Israel, mission members met with Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, visited the Kotel, toured a military base, and were granted a private tour of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial. They also toured several communities, such as Kiryat Moshe, Kfar Gvirol and Eilat, with which UJA Federation has developed special relationships. "Being a contributor to UJA for many years, it was heartwarming to see the good work that is being done," says Gozlan.

The trip resonated with each participant in a different way. For Honey Rubenstein, the highlight of the trip was visiting the Old City of Jerusalem and seeing the Kotel.

For Gozlan, it was dancing around a hangar at a naval base in Eilat. And for Morton, the highlight was the fulfillment of a personal goal to climb the Red Canyon.

The trip appealed to mission novices, like Rubenstein and Gozlan and veterans, like Morton. "We've been on 'jillions' of missions," says Morton. "Each one shows us something we haven't seen before."

Both Gozlan and Rubenstein say that while this was their first mission, it will not be their last

"If this mission did anything, it hooked my entire family onto a love for Israel that will not go away," says Gozlan.

Over 20 global Jewish cultures on display in Toronto

Torontonians often celebrate the multicultural nature of their hometown, but few realize that this diversity also extends to the city's Jewish community.

On June 11, this vibrancy will be celebrated with the Jewish Mosaic Festival, an event, to be held at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC), showcasing Jewish life in the Greater Toronto Area, originating from countries around the world.

Representatives from more than 20 countries, including Turkey, Jamaica, Argentina, Mexico, China and India, will participate in the festival. The event will include exhibits, presentations and entertainment celebrating both the differences and the commonalities of the featured Jewish communities.

Entertainment will include an Argentinean choir, Israeli dancers, The Hallelujah Drummers, and Lenka Lichtenberg. There will also be food from Jewish communities and a marketplace selling an array of products.

Lenka Lichtenberg - Czechoslovakia

Baza Makonan - Ethiopia

"This festival will allow each country to showcase cultural artifacts and customs," says Janet Klein-Slavin of the BJCC. "These items may be either unique to Jews from their respective country or may emphasize similarities."

"What makes this unique is the number of different cultures reflecting our Jewish diversity," says Gail Gould, assistant executive director of the BJCC.

"It's Jewish people from India and Iraq and places where we don't really know about the Jewish communities. It's a learning experience," adds the BJCC's Noa Lipton.

Lipton notes that the event will appeal to people of all ages, with wheelchair accessibility and a kids' zone with inflatables, face painting, and activities geared towards children. Adding to the accessibility of the event will be a complimentary bus running from the Bernard Betel Centre to the BJCC.

Faces of Jewish Toronto, a photo exhibit organized as part of the festival, will also open that day. The exhibit features portraits of Jewish Torontonians from around the world by Toronto-based photographers Andrew Maidanik and Dimitry Chatrov.

In addition, the festival will feature an evening screening of Quest for the Lost Tribes, a documentary by Toronto filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici.

"Our Jewish community, which stands at close to 200,000, is diverse, vibrant and very proud of its roots," says Howard English, vice president, Marketing and Communications, UJA Federation. "This festival will not only reflect the community's remarkable quality of life, but also the pride felt by Jewish community members in the Greater Toronto Area," he adds.

"As Jews, we're always encouraging pluralism in the broader community," says the Bernard Betel Centre's Mara Koven. "But we have to do that within our own community as well. This is a proactive way to keep celebrating diversity."

The Jewish Mosaic Festival is sponsored by UJA Federation, Chartwell Constantia Retirement Residence, The Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, The Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, and JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto.

Jewish organizations fight union's Israel boycott

UJA Federation to implement CJC & CIC campaign

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) are mounting a strong campaign of opposition to a recent resolution approved by the Ontario branch of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) calling for a boycott against Israel. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is working locally with CJC Ontario Region to implement this campaign.

The CUPE resolution calls for "the international campaign of boycott, divestment and sanctions until Israel meets its obligation to recognize the Palestinian people's inalienable right to self-determination and fully complies with the precepts of international law including the right of Palestinian refugees to return to their homes and properties as stipulated in UN resolution 194."

Steven Shulman

"CUPE Ontario has taken an extremely radical position which, based on a flood of reaction we've received from CUPE Ontario members, is not representative of the union rank and file in this province," says Steven Shulman, Ontario regional director, and national general counsel, Canadian Jewish Congress. "Unfortunately, a small number of people within the union and its leadership are behind this outrageous position to the detriment of CUPE Ontario's reputation."

According to Shulman, the resolution is not based in fact, but rather anchored in complete falsehood.

"This resolution reads like something that might have been issued 20 years ago instead of today," he says. "In the wake of the Gaza disengagement, coupled with a Palestinian Hamas government which supports terror and is committed to the destruction of Israel, this resolution is an anachronism."

"CUPE local 2063, which represents workers from UJA Federation, Canadian Jewish Congress and JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto, are absolutely outraged at this ridiculous anti-Israel initiative," says Lil Nobel, president, CUPE local 2063. "The phone has not stopped ringing since this boycott was announced, as people – Jews and non-Jews alike – want to voice their displeasure. Our employees are voicing shame in being part of CUPE and we are currently looking at our options."

Sid Ryan

An Action Alert from CJC and the Canada-Israel Committee calls for Canadians to contact CUPE's leadership to denounce the resolution. Messages can be sent by email to CUPE Ontario president Sid Ryan at sryan@cupe.on.ca.

The alert also asks Canadian clergy to call upon their congregants to contact CUPE Ontario. Canadian Jewish Congress is also discussing the CUPE Ontario resolution with other Canadian unions and with representatives from different faith communities across the country.

This isn't the first time that CUPE Ontario has become immersed in Middle East resolutions. In June 2002, at the height of the intifada, a CUPE resolution demanded that "Israel immediately end its current military assaults" and that the Israeli government "immediately withdraw from the occupied territories and abide by UN resolution 242."

The resolution referred to territories that Israel "invaded" in 1967. It also called for "an end to the suicide bombings and other acts of violence that take the lives of innocent people."

UJA Federation establishes earthquake relief fund

Donations will help Israeli organization assist Indonesian victims

On May 27, a devastating earthquake ravaged highly populated areas just east of Indonesia's capital, Jakarta. The magnitude 6.2 quake flattened homes and buildings as people slept, with a death toll that stands at close to 6,000 people at press time.

More than 200,000 people are homeless in the nation's worst disaster since the 2004 tsunami, forced to live on the streets, in rice fields and even in graveyards.

To assist victims of this tragedy, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has created the Indonesia Earthquake Relief Fund which will support the activities of IsraAid, the Israeli Forum for International Aid, an Israeli relief organization which travels around the world helping those in need. Most recently, IsrAid helped the people in the Darfur region of Sudan, who were fleeing a program of ethnically charged violence.

"We have sent in a team of relief workers with kitchens and chefs, some doctors and logisticians," says Shachar Zahavi, founder of IsraAid. "The idea is to provide feeding stations for the thousands of people going without food and shelter and take care of these needs until the government and the United Nations are able to provide a steady, ongoing feeding program."

According to Zahavi, many Israelis believe that people affected by disasters – even some who live in countries that have no diplomatic relations with Israel – deserve their assistance.

"This is not the first mission and won't be the last where Israel is offering its assistance," he says. "We see ourselves as part of the international community and rely not only on the generous heart of the Israeli people, but also on our long-standing tradition of tikun olam, helping those in need. We believe that we have the capabilities and the knowledge to help relieve the suffering and pain of those affected, and that's what we must do."

"Wherever there are tragedies and innocent men, women and children are forced to live without the basic necessities of life, we simply must not look away," says UJA Federation chair David Engel.

Educators look at Jewish identity in day schools

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Association for Canadian Jewish Studies

Although Jewish schools are designed primarily for children, York University sociologist Randal Schnoor suggests that they may be just as important in the lives of Jewish parents and their own Jewish identity.

Schnoor – who is working with Alex Pomson of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, York's former chair of Jewish teacher education at York University, on a book about the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School (DJDS) – spoke last week at the annual Association for Canadian Jewish Studies conference held in part at York University. "One of the key themes we're looking at is how the Jewish day school can help foster the Jewish identities of the parents," he said.

Also speaking at the same session on Jewish day schools were Dan Mendelsohn Aviv of Bialik Hebrew Day School, who discussed Hebrew language instruction, and Jack Lipinsky of United Synagogue Day School and the University of Toronto's School of Continuing Studies, who discussed the Canadian Jewish history text he co-wrote.

"Adults in their 30s, 40s and 50s are finding less meaning in Jewish institutions," Schnoor said. For many of the Penna school's parents, he said, living downtown represents "an intent to disengage from organized denominational Jewish life." About a third of them are intermarried, have converted to Judaism, are part of same-sex families, live common-law or are single parents, and only a small proportion belong to synagogues, he added.

Schnoor's presentation, titled "School as Shul," likened the school to the synagogue in terms of three roles that have been connected to the synagogue by other scholars. Traditionally, Schnoor said, the synagogue fills three functions: a house of meeting or assembly (socializing), educational, and spiritual.

Even as a researcher who is not a school parent, Schnoor said he has felt "a warm sense of being part of an accepting community."

For many DJDS parents, the school serves as "a type of Jewish haven, the only Jewish place they feel comfortable."

Also, he said, although parents at the school showed little interest in attending formal educational programs, aspects of the school curriculum often provoked them to contact the school regarding theological issues.

The school is "an instructive case study for the potential for schools to have an impact on parents," said Schnoor. "We are suggesting the school can serve as a primary locus of Jewish identity for adults.

"It may serve as a gateway to engaged Jewish life for parents no less than for the children themselves."

Mendelsohn Aviv, a Hebrew studies teacher at Bialik Hebrew Day School and an adjunct professor of Jewish education at Gratz College, said that Hebrew instruction is an essential component of Jewish identity.

However, he noted, despite the thousands of hours devoted to teaching Hebrew to 11,000 Jewish students in Toronto every week, there are "countless" anecdotes about students who can't read a newspaper or have a conversation in Hebrew.

"Perhaps we must consider teaching Hebrew for specific purposes," he suggested, citing travel to Israel as one possibility. "No one method will work for all classrooms and all students."

By 2030, he noted, more than half the world's Jews will be Hebrew speakers.

Lipinsky, of United Synagogue Day School and the University of Toronto, admitted that students "are not always excited about history, especially Canadian history."

As co-author of the textbook Telling Our Story: A History of the Jews in Canada to 1920, he said most day school students tend to compartmentalize their Hebrew and general studies.

He has found they relate better to their history lessons when they are "ethnically flavoured.

"Part of our role as historians is not only to measure identity but to foster it," he said.

Battle of the Bands helps teen drug program

By JESSICA FREIMAN
CJN Intern

At a Pink Floyd concert in Toronto nearly two decades ago, 14-year-old Benji Hayward tried LSD. Later that night, Hayward drowned in Lake Ontario.

Eighteen years have passed, and to honour Hayward's memory, Toronto teens have come together at another concert to prevent tragedies like his from recurring.

High school bands from across the city converged recently at The Reverb, a club on Queen Street, to compete in a Battle of the Bands to raise money for the Benji Hayward Teen Program.

The program, run by Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others (JACS), was named in Hayward's memory and is a forum for high school students to talk openly with peers about drugs, alcohol, sex and life issues.

"We started the Benji Hayward Teen Program this past September, and since then we have been extremely successful, with 150 teens participating," said Nicole Burger, Benji Hayward teen program co-ordinator.

The group meets every Sunday from 7:30 p.m. until 9 p.m. at JACS Place, located at 858 Sheppard Avenue West. "We have free pizza and pop, and we give community service hours for attending," said Burger.

"Everyone in the room at the program is a teen except for myself and an addiction specialist," said Burger. "It's an open environment where people don't feel embarrassed or judged. We talk about sex, drugs, family, exams, everything."

Two members of the band "The Weathermaking Challenge", are seen performing in the JACS Battle of the Bands.

A wide spectrum of kids attends the weekly sessions. "We have really rich kids and kids from broken homes. We have Orthodox kids and unaffiliated kids."

Apparently, drugs don't discriminate. Substance abuse is an issue that plagues the youth of every part of Toronto's Jewish community.

At the sessions, the teens make pledges to progress in their own way. "The kids who use hard drugs commit to only use marijuana. The kids who use marijuana commit to limiting their use to the weekends," said Burger.

Connecting kids who feel that they need help with drug counsellors and treatment centres is another aspect of the program. The object is to prevent drug abuse and tragedies in the community.

Benji Hayward's father, Gordon, is the chair of JACS' outreach and education committee, and is a member of JACS' board of directors.

The Battle of the Bands event was organized by Benji Hayward Teen Program participants themselves, and raised $5,000 for the program. An audience of 500 came to see bands compete for the coveted prize: the opportunity to lay down their tracks at a professional recording studio.

Seven bands comprised of students from high schools across the GTA played for a panel of celebrity judges, including former member of Our Lady Peace, Mike Turner, radio personality Todd Shapiro of 102.1 The Edge, and MTV Canada host Anna Cyzon.

The big winners of the evening were the members of a band called Stop Drop N Skank from York Mills, Avendale, Rosedale and Earl Haig high schools.

They were followed by Sugarcraft of CHAT Richmond Hill in second place. Third place was awarded to The Weathermaking Challenge of Westmount Collegiate Institute and Crestwood.

Burger considers the evening a huge success. "This was an event that the kids in the program helped to plan, which allows them to feel part of JACS. They walk away knowing they've accomplished something.

"Our goal was also to raise money and awareness of the Benji Hayward Teen Program, and now the 500 people who attended the Battle of the Bands know about what we do."

Judaism: no vacations, only holy days

By RABBI WAYNE ALLEN

Rabbinic Reflections

Of late there has been a surrender to Americanisms when it comes to language and spelling. Spelling bees, for example, will increasingly demand American spellings rather than the British and Canadian one. And American usages are gradually replacing the Canadian. "Bathroom" has now become as common as "washroom," if not more so. To me, it makes little difference in most cases. But there is one specific usage that I believe we should fight vigorously to retain.

Historically, Canadians, like our British precursors, went on "holidays," not "vacations." The word "holiday" is a conflation of two words: holy and day. A holiday suggests a time devoted to the sacred. On the other hand, the word "vacation" derives from a Latin root, vacatio, which means an emptying, an absence of something. Typically, it refers to a suspension of one's normal activities, an absence of routine.

But while the purpose of a vacation may simply be a break from one's regular duties or a change of pace, it sometimes entails much more. Vacationers themselves describe their goal as an escape from responsibilities, an opportunity to have no concerns.

Too often Jews are on long vacations from Judaism. Others just want to escape for a little while. But Judaism is a vocation that demands daily devotion, regular observance, and continuous commitment. No vacation is plausible, let alone possible.

An illustrative, though somewhat irreverent, story is told of an old-timer who decided to take a long overdue vacation. He had always conducted himself as a fine Jew, but for this once he was going to "live." So he buys a whole new wardrobe of the sharpest clothes, shaves his beard and books a flight to Las Vegas. As soon as he unpacks his bags, he stuffs some cash in his pockets and heads across the street from his fancy hotel to the nearest casino. He gets halfway across, and an oncoming truck hits him, killing him on the spot.

As his soul is departing from this world, he looks heavenward and asks plaintively: "Master of the universe, I have always been a faithful Jew. I have kept kosher, observed the Torah punctiliously, supported those in need, attended synagogue regularly, studied daily and gave generously to community institutions. Did I deserve to die in such a way?" And a heavenly voice responds: "Moish? Was that you?"

The danger in taking a vacation from Judaism is not that vacationers might get hit by a truck, but that vacations from Judaism might become permanent. And the consequences would be tragic. Consider the case of the Trobriand Islanders of Melanesia. These inhabitants of the South Pacific once found themselves with an embarrassment of leisure. Their yams came up so abundantly that they had no need to work for their food. To occupy their spare time, the islanders devised the Kula, a ceremonial exchange of relatively worthless objects such as red shell necklaces and white shell bracelets. The Kula soon became formalized with canoe trips around the island for no apparent reason. The Kula eventually became not only the vacation but the vocation of the islanders. With no working the soil, the yams became sparse, but the Kula persisted. And the islanders starved.

From Jewish practice, there is no vacation, only holy-days. So as we pack to take some time away, let's remember to include tallit, tfillin, a siddur, a Chumash, Shabbat candles and kosher food.

A soulful journey

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Midrashic Moments

In upcoming Torah portions, we read the desciption of the Nazarite. These are people who have taken a vow to dedicate themselves to God for a specific amount of time. During that time period, Nazarites begin a spiritual journey that removes them from many of the usual experiences we all face. A Nazarite will refrain from drinking wine or any fermented drinks and is not allowed to engage in mourning rituals or be present at a graveside. Nazarites are also prohibited from cutting their hair for the duration of the vow.

By not drinking wine, Nazarites removed themselves from the most common way in which we express our joy. We bless wine on Shabbat and we include wine in our ritual festive meals for many reasons, including a symbolic expression of our joy. Nazarites cannot partake of that expression. Such a person is also prohibited from attending a funeral or burial, even of a close family member. In other words, the extremes of human emotion are now outside the realm of the Nazarite. Neither extreme joy nor extreme sadness must be encountered.

The prohibition against cutting the hair implies a rejection of all arbitrary societal boundaries. Nature meant for our hair to grow, while society tells us to groom and cut it. By prohibiting the cutting of Nazarites' hair, the Torah has told these people that they have removed themselves from the arbitrariness of society. And the prohibition on wine and mourning means that Nazarites do not participate in the rituals that bind a community. With their absence and their wild hair, their appearance will soon reflect the outsider they will become.

All of this is done in order to partake of a spiritual journey with God. One would think this is a holy endeavour to be praised and sought. Yet, the Torah informs us that at the end of such a process, Nazarites are to bring a sin offering, for they have sinned against a soul.

The Talmud questions this sin offering by asking against which soul the Nazarite has sinned. The answer is that people who take a Nazarite vow have sinned against their own souls. Yet, surely, it would seem that it is fulfilling to their soul to engage in spiritual journeys and deny society. In fact, the very negation of human emotion in its extreme form, joy and sadness, would seem to put focus on the soul. Is this not a good thing?

The answer may lie in the fact that to become a Nazarite, to have a spiritual journey, required a separation from essential things. Humanity, emotional expression, community these are crucial parts of our Jewish existence. The Nazarite has not been commanded to take on extra commandments and good deeds, rather to refrain from things.

A Nazarite can remain spiritually true by refraining from certain actions, and yet the Torah requires a sin offering.

In an ideal world, we do not engage in spiritual journeys that negate essential human truths. That is a sin we commit against ourselves. An ancient midrash expresses this well when it teaches us that we do not enhance our souls by denying ourselves specific things. On the contrary, we enhance our souls by producing specific things. Pirkei d'Rabbi Eliezer teaches us that people produce three trusted companions in their life: their children, their worldly possessions and their good deeds.

Nazarites need not bring children into the world, bring positive articles to the world or enhance the world with their good deeds. Missing such an opportunity would indeed be a sin.

World Zionist Congress, Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"In Basel I have founded the Jewish State. Were I to state this loudly today, the response would be universal derision. Perhaps in five years, certainly in 50 years, all will admit it."

Theodor Herzl wrote those words on Sept. 3, 1897, following the First Zionist Congress held in Basel, Switzerland. [http://tinyurl.com/ozqhy] Since that historic congress, Zionists have met dozens of times. They meet later this month in Jerusalem at the 35th World Zionist Congress. This week and next, a look at past congresses and at the issues facing delegates this year.

Although the official Congress site is replete with requisite constitutions, proclamations and sundry legal documents [http://tinyurl.com/n26fo], I found a corner of it particularly compelling – two essays that stir up debate over modern Zionism.

Veteran left-wing member of Knesset Yossi Sarid asks whether Herzl is "turning in his grave in view of what has become of his vision in reality." Sarid says Herzl wisely warned against putting a higher value on territory than on the importance of people. In addition, Herzl warned against "the theocratic urges of our clerics to dominate."
